ALL EAGER TO GO TO MONT-LAWN

City Waifs Looking Forward Expectantly to the Opening of Our Children's Home

As warm weather approaches, the streets of New York, in the tenement sections, furnish the usual cause for wonder to visitors and tourists who carry their journeys of investigation into the crowded districts. Even when these sections are not sought deliberately, it is impossible to escape seeing somewhat of them and their congested conditions, on one's way to the ferries downtown, and to the parks uptown. Recently the writer was taking a guest over the Third Ave. Elevated Road to the Bronx; looking out of the windows upon the side streets running towards East River, the stranger said:

"I never saw thoroughfares so thronged. All the people in New York must be here. And the children! No place to play but the streets! No green grass! Only stone under their little feet! No brooks to play in—just a gutter!"

When she was convoyed through Stanton, Cherry, Hester, Clinton, Oak and other streets of the lower East Side, the exclamation came: "I thought all the people in New York were uptown. Now, I see they are here. Where do these people live? Not in the houses—it can't be. There is not enough room for them in those buildings. Why, the doors and windows and fire escapes are as full as they can hold now. And the middle of the street is full, and the sidewalks are full."

"But they do live in those houses. It is said that five hundred children live in that big tenement nearly opposite the Gospel Settlement. And that is a fairly comfortable house; it is nearly new and of stone. There are some homes in this neighborhood where all the cooking, washing, ironing, eating and sleeping goes on in one room—where children never know what it is to have a bed to sleep on; never know what it is to sit down to an orderly table, or to eat a good and sufficient meal——"

"Except when they are at Mont-Lawn," she said with a smile.

She had heard children on all sides asking the missionary, "Can't we go to Mont-Lawn this summer?" "Can me little brudder go to de country, missus? He's been sick." "Aw, say, teacher, can't me little sister go to Mont-Lawn, too?" And she had seen many childeyes brighten with hope when childlike lips were too shy to plead.

She had seen homes at the top of steep, dark stairways, where poverty stricken mothers labored away at their sewing or washing, with a devotion and faithfulness that made their toil a sacred thing. In damp, dark cellars she had found motherhood and childhood showing forth a some measure of inherent beauty and tenderness, even as a plant may sometimes flower in the dark.

"I do not see how they exist at all here in the summer time," she said. "The heat and odors must be fearful."

After her departure a letter came from her, and the picture on this page. "You remember my little Kodak," she wrote. "Well, most of my 'snaps' were failures. They were simply a blur of too many figures. This that I got in one of the less crowded quarters is the only one my little boy likes. It is a bit cheerful and happy, too, and a pleasanter souvenir of my 'slumming' stroll than those I failed to get would be. I simply want to forget some of the things I saw—they make me unhappy. But I don't want to forget to help.

"NO PLACE TO PLAY BUT THE STREETS! . . . . . NO GREEN GRASS!"

In my little boy's name, I send $42 to sustain two cots at Mont-Lawn this summer. It is not much, but it will make sure that fourteen waifs sleep in good beds, play on the grass and have plenty to eat for ten whole days in 'Childhood's Paradise.'"

How many like this good mother will help us bring sunshine into darkened child-lives this summer? Only $21 supports a bed (the bed to be named by the donor) for the season: $3 gives one waif an outing of ten days; $6 sends two to Mont-Lawn; $9 three; $12 four; and so on. Little garments your children have outgrown, boots, shoes and hats—anything that a child from five to thirteen can wear will be welcome; rubber balls and dolls will not be despised. All contributions sent to this paper will be promptly acknowledged.

It was about three o'clock when Matti Luhtanen, looking up from his work, announced that the pile would soon be ready for igniting. He felt in his pockets for a match, but found none, so he called to his eldest son Wilho to give him some.

"I lent my box to Juho Wanhala this morning," said Wilho. "Say, Juho!" he cried, "hand over my matches, will you?"

But there was no reply. Half a dozen voices were soon crying for Juho, but no Juho was to be found! Lippo Wanhala began to look anxious; even Antero was uneasy. That conversation of the morning began to acquire an unusual significance. He remembered that Mina Luhtanen was alone with her mother at the farmhouse, and he began to fear he knew not what.

One of the party chanced to have a burning-glass, but there was no sun, nor had been all day. Antero was plied with questions as to Juho's whereabouts and his motives for absenting himself on such an occasion, when every man's labor was needed, and his inability to explain placed him in an embarrassing position, and caused Wilho and his brother Aaro finally to lose their temper, and indulge in muttered threats against the absent Juho. Karin attempted to pacify her brothers, but met with ill-success. Aaro turned on her sharply:

"It ill beseems a Finnish maiden to blow hot and cold with one breath. This morning you were tormenting Juho without reason, and now when we have just cause to complain of him, your feathers are all ruffled in his defence."

Karin blushed hotly, and was about to reply, when her father broke in authoritatively.

"Now, now, children, put an end to this useless discussion. We must deal with Juho later. Hunt for some dry sticks, and we'll see whether we cannot manage to rub a flame out of them."

After a long search, and infinite trouble and patience, a spark was fanned into a flame, and the great pile was at last lighted at the exterior edges. Dense smoke began to curl upward around it, and struggle up through the damp covering of soil, while the whole band busied themselves in zealously fanning the incipient blaze till reasonably assured there was little danger of its becoming extinguished.

"And now, boys," said Luhtanen, "Wilho and I will stay behind to take turns to watch the burning. Do you others go home, while you, Lippo, can come with my boy Aaro, at six in the morning, to relieve us. Aaro," he called after his son, as the men were setting out, "do nothing about Juho when you get home. I'll attend to that afterwards."

The young man gave an unwilling assent, and went muttering after the rest. So Matti and Wilho were left to keep watch over the charcoal oven.

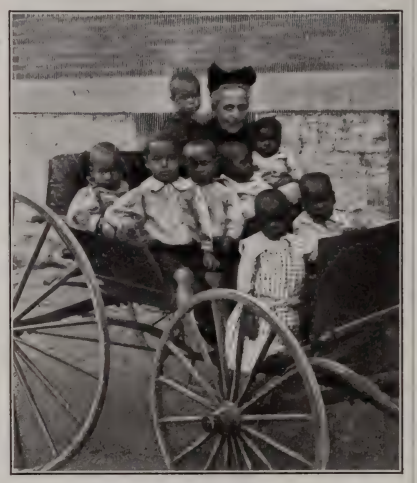
WORK AMONG NEGRO CHILDREN

MRS. STEELE, founder and manager of the Steele Home for Needy Children, Chattanooga, Tenn., an institution well known to readers of this paper, related during a recent visit to this office, the following incident connected with her work:

"Last summer, we had a very severe drought in our part of the country, and wells and cisterns became dry. And although in May I had moved our family out to our summer home, in July I had to move them all back to Chattanooga for lack of water on our place. I brought the youngest—our babies—in on the train myself, having wired our boy to meet me with the buggy. I had to let him walk home, while I drove, because my buggy was full without him, as the picture shows. The babies were all good as gold, still as mice, and gave no trouble, but as we went through the town, I noticed people staring at us and laughing; and then I realized that we were really a comical sight. Up to that time, I had been so engrossed with the care and comfort of the babies that I had not thought of our appearance at all. After I reached home, some of my helpers suggested that we have a photograph taken. 'Because,' they added, 'when you write to your friends that you carried eight babies in that buggy, you ought to send proof along.'



MRS. ALMIRA STEELE AND HER LITTLE CHARGES

"I have cared for 944 children since I founded this home for destitute colored orphans in 1880. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have been among my strong helpers, and Dr. Klopsch's checks have always come to us as a timely relief. Since we have never had to solicit financial aid from any source, we are the more deeply touched when the Lord inclines his people to remember us. Through the kindness of a Quaker friend we have been provided with a summer home-place where we have erected one building, and hope to erect another, and also to get an artesian well bored. After all, the feeding of my charges is my greatest care—no, I should not say my greatest care, for the Lord careth for us."

Harlem's Little Finnish Church

AMONG Finlanders living in New York, none have shown more active interest in the welfare of their compatriots here and over the ocean, than Pastor Gustavus Blomgren, of the Finnish Evangelical Church of Harlem. The word "church," applies only to the body of worshipers, not to the place in which they meet, for that is only a little rented hall, corner of Park avenue and 120th street. On Thursday nights, and twice on Sunday, a handful of earnest Finlanders gather in this hall around their pastor, and worship the Lord with the voice of prayer and praise. They support Pastor Blomgren and his family out of their scanty earnings, pay hall rent, and carry all the other expenses of their church work cheerfully, asking no outside aid. There is something touching in the thought that they sent for him to come from far-away Finland to be their shepherd here. There are many Swedish churches in New York which Swedish-speaking Finns can attend, but those speaking Finnish only have been at great disadvantage on this account. Finns not understanding the language of any churches near them stood in religious isolation. Hungry to hear the Word of Life in their own tongue again, they sent money to Finland and brought over their pastor.

PASTOR GUSTAVUS BLOMGREN

Pastor Blomgren is a native of Williamstrand, Finland. He is thoroughly devoted to his Gospel work among his fellow-countrymen here. Young Finns coming to the great city, encounter temptations unknown before. They are often dazzled, confused, diverted into strange, wrong ways before they know it. "We are doing everything at my church to draw them in — to save the young," said the Pastor. "There are about 6,000 Finnish-speaking Finns in Greater New York, and but two Finnish-speaking churches — the one I serve and one in Brooklyn. We here and abroad thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for bringing our starving friends at home to the attention of Christian America."

Pastor Blomgren's district "covers," as he says, "half of New York." He is a very busy man. He visits his people in their homes, officiates at baptisms, weddings and funerals; visits the sick in the hospitals—all the hospitals have his card and his promise to go at call to any afflicted Finn. He is trying to establish a "Christian Home for Finnish Immigrants," where poor Finns, arriving here, may stay overnight, or for a few days, while looking for work. And he is endeavoring earnestly to secure means for the erection of a chapel for his congregation, which is growing so fast that the little hall is not large enough. Only twenty-five people called him. His church has eighty-four members now, a Young People's Association numbering fifty-three, and a flourishing Sunday School.

"MATER DOLOROSA"

BECAUSE of one small low-laid head all crowned with golden hair,
Forevermore all fair young brows to me a halo wear;
I kiss them reverently. Alas! I know the pain I bear.
Because of little dimpled hands that now enfolded lie,
All little hands henceforth to me do have a pleading cry;
I clasp them as they were, small wandering birds lured home to fly.
Because of little death-cold feet, for earth's rough roads unmeet,
I'd journey leagues to save from sin or harm such little feet.
And count the lowliest service done for them so sacred—sweet!

M. E. PAULL.

"Better Every Year"

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I have received The Story of the Hall of Fame, and wish to say that it exceeds my expectations; it is grand. I have also received the "Art Gallery." The pictures are all beautiful. I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a number of years and like it better every year.

Announcement of Prize-Winners in Competition of April 1

Answers to Competition 32, in our issue of April 1, are: 1. Philippi. 2. Kedron. To "Curious Questions" (Competition 33) of that date are: 1. When Eli's sons refused the usual cooked meat of the sacrifice, demanding the raw flesh. (I. Sam. 2: 13-15)... 2. When Jazael spread a wet towel (or "cloth") over the mouth of Ben-hadad, thereby smothering him. (II. Kings 8: 15)... 3. David. The letters of his name according to Roman rotation equal 1006; he died about 1014.... 4. When Hezekiah's representatives interrupted Rab-Shakeh, Sennacherib's messenger, who was speaking to them in Hebrew, with the request that he would use Syriac, his own language, Rab-Shakeh was uttering blasphemies and seeking to incite the Jews to rebellion against Hezekiah and the acceptance of Sennacherib as their ruler. Hezekiah's representatives did not wish the Jewish people who were listening to understand what was said. II. Kings 18: 26.

An Encouraging Question*

An Anniversary Consideration Full of Inspiring Suggestion

HOW many brave souls have taken new heart under discouragement, and have renewed the struggle against an enemy that seemed too powerful ever to be defeated, as they have recalled the Apostle's question: "If God be for us, who can be against us?" After these years of progress and achievement, the Epworth League asks the question triumphantly. It has proved that the opposition of men is of no account when God is owning and blessing the work; but time has been, in the history of the movement, when the question was needed as inspiration and encouragement. Men who ought to have been in sympathy with the movement scoffed at it, derided its principles, and questioned its utility. It was an innovation: it was duplicating machinery; it was liable to develop youthful vanity; it was this and that and the other, that was unnecessary, if not mischievous. Cold water was thrown on it, sometimes obstacles were raised in the way; but how it has grown, how it has prospered! The mighty host of its members scattered over the land answers the Apostle's question.

The movement is now at its critical stage. The novelty has worn off; jealousy and discontent have manifested themselves here and there. Difficulties, which it is useless to disguise or ignore, have arisen, and there are many holding aloof whose help would be welcome. There is need of vigilance, of fidelity, of renewed consecration. Every anniversary is an Ebenezer, but the journey is not finished. Past achievements are an inspiration, and not couches of rest. Since the movement began, young members have attained middle age, and are now active in other departments of church work. It is for them, conscious of the help they have derived from it, to foster and encourage the movement, so that the young people may be trained, as they have been, and may be prepared for adult service. The young members, too, may be encouraged by the example of the pioneers, and may go on to new triumphs. There is still much land to be possessed. Does any heart fail? Let that heart nerve itself with the conviction, that God being for us, it matters little who is against us.

Chinese Christians in New York

THE thirteenth anniversary of St. Bartholomew's Chinese Guild, was celebrated in New York lately. Mr. Guy Main, a native of China, who has charge of this important work at St. Bartholomew's, presided. The exercises consisted of original and selected pieces recited in English by converted Chinamen. The subjects chosen were spiritual and national, such as "The Bible," "The Lamb of God," "George Washington," and many others. It was a touching sight to see the uplifted faces of these Christian Chinese as they sang with great earnestness the old Gospel hymns. The influence of Christian missions upon the Chinese is very apparent in this work, in which the Chinaman is not treated as an alien but as a fellow citizen of the Heavenly Kingdom.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Home Coming

THE brother motioned her to precede him into the house.

It is what is known in some sections as "a double-pen house"—a four-roomed cottage, divided by a passage open at either end. The construction was of the rudest. The walls were unceiled. No effort had been made to hide the native ugliness with paint or whitewash. Above the bare beams loomed the dark comb of the roof. But from the room on the left cheery firelight was streaming, and Philip Arnold stopped on the threshold with a cry of astonishment.

"Una, you witch! what have you been doing?" he cried. For the rough walls were clothed with crimson; the gaunt chimney had become a bower of cedar and pine, and over the black rafters had been thrown a veil of fruit-blossoms, fine and fair as a bride's lace. There were flowers, too, on the table, which was laid for the evening meal. Snowy sheepskins were on the bare floor, and beside the hearth, a couch, piled high with cushions of the same ruddy hue as the walls.

"Do you like it?" asked the girl, with a happy laugh.

"Like it?" He drew her to him, his eyes starry with feeling, but could say no more.

She led him to a lounge beside the fire, and pushing him gently down on the cushions sank on a fleece at his feet.

"I planned it all out one night when you were sick, Philip. I saw just how it could be done, though, of course, it has taken time to work it out. Maggie has been so interested and so helpful. Her father made the couch you are sitting on out of wild grape vines—do you see? And the shelf yonder for your books and the little closet with the red curtains, where I have put my bits of china. And her mother gave me the dye, that I might have everything the warm color that you love, my darling!" The playful tone changed suddenly to one of passionate tenderness. "Do you suppose I do not know what the life in the mining camp is for you. There is a meaning in what I have been doing to-day. Can you read it?"

"How love conceals defects and makes ugliness beautiful?"

"No, sir! It is how much beauty there is in the commonest things about us; if we would only take the pains to bring it out."

This is part of the scene which introduces the hero and heroine of Fool's Gold, by Annie Raymond Stillman. It is essentially a story-book—would, in fact, make the basis of an excellent melodrama. The action is quick enough to prevent the interest from flagging, and in the delineation of the conflict between duty and supposed self-interest the strong purposes of the book is evident. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Price $1.50.

What Berry Found

THE fact that Paul Laurence Dunbar is the only Anglo-African author who is entitled to literary honors, gives a special interest to his novel, The Sport of the Gods.* He presents his picture in strong colors and it is impossible to withhold praise from the workmanship. Unfortunately, the subject is not a pleasant one. It is a pitiful story of the degradation of a whole family through the unjust imprisonment of the father. But the book is not one to put down unfinished — the characters are drawn with a rare fidelity to life; not once do you encounter a jarring note of exaggeration.

There is a good scene when the father, at last released from jail, goes to New York to find his wife.

Now he stood before her, and she knew him at a glance, in spite of his haggard countenance.

"Fannie," he said, holding out his arms to her, and all of the pain and pathos of long yearning was in his voice, "don't you know me?"

She shrank away from him, back in the hallway.

"Yes, yes, Be'y, I knows you. Come in."

She led him through the passageway and into her room, he following with a sudden sinking at his heart.

When they were within the room he turned and held out his arms to her again, but she did not notice them. "Why, is you 'shamed o' me?" he asked brokenly.

"'Shamed? No! Oh, Be'y," and she sank into a chair and began rocking to and fro in her helpless grief.

"What's de mattah, Fannie? Ain't you glad to see me?"

"Yes, yes, but you don't know nothin', do you? Dey lef' me to tell you."

"Lef' you to tell me? What's de mattah. Is Joe or Kit daid? Tell me?"

"No, not daid. Kit dances on de stage fer' a livin', an' Be'y, she ain't de gal she ust to be. Joe—Joe—Joe—he's in pen'tentiary fu' killin' a ooman."

Berry started forward with a cry, "My little gal! My boy!"

"Dat ain't all," she went on dully, as if reciting a rote lesson; "I ain't yo' wife no mo'. I's ma'ied ag'in. Oh, Be'y, Be'y, don't look at me lak dat. I could n't he'p it. Kit and Joe lef' me, an' dey said de pen'tentiary devo'ced you and me, an' dat you'd nevah come out nohow. Don't look at me like that, Be'y. Don't cry, Be'y," she said, "I done wrong, but I loves you yit."

The Culture of the Voice*

A VOLUME entitled Physiological Voice Culture, by T. Edward Perkins, M.D., just issued, presents a very complete and exhaustive treatment of a most attractive subject. The book will be specially welcomed by teachers and students of voice culture. The second chapter, treating as it does, in masterly analysis of the components of the speaking and singing voice, is alone worth more than the price of the book. The anatomy and physiology of respiration, or the breathing process, will be found especially helpful to those who have studied about the breath in sustaining tones. The larynx and the various parts associated in the production of voice are described and illustrated in a simple, attractive manner, quite different from the style in which the subject is usually treated. It is a difficult problem to present a scientific subject in a way easily understood by both teacher and student; to brush aside technique, even to the point of losing sight of scholar and master, in order that the average plain man may read and understand. If the author has no other excellence, he excels in this respect. He has produced a popular treatise on an abstruse subject.

Young People's Ideals†

Ideals for Young People is an interesting little book by the Rev. M. E. Harland. In it the author not only gives his own views on a number of questions that appeal to young people, but also a clever summary of the views of some 2,000 young men and women for whose opinion he asked on the various topics.

Among the questions that concerned the ideal home is this: "Is club-life, for either husband or wife, a menace to the home?" All the men, and seventy per cent. of the women, answered that it was.

Another question was: "Is the present tendency of young men to enter business or professional careers a menace to future ideal homes?" Sixty-seven per cent. of the women and sixty per cent. of the men answered in the affirmative.

"Opportunities"
is a practical monthly magazine for those who are seeking new occupations, whether with capital or without. It keeps track of the chances of the aspirant in the ever-changing professions, trades and occupations. It tells which of these are crowded and why, and which are not. It tells definitely, in figures as exact as possible, what a person may expect to earn in any line of work. It treats also of the newly-opened professions, such as forestry, for instance, and tells of the chances in the colonies. In short, through its correspondents and experts everywhere, it keeps in touch with the whole world, and the thousands of opportunities it affords in a way impossible to any single person.
"OPPORTUNITIES" does not deal in platitudes and sermons on the necessity of honesty, perseverance, sobriety, energy and all the other virtues. It takes it for granted for the most part that the reader recognizes these qualities as absolutely necessary nowadays in the race for success, and leaves preaching on these topics to the magazines that make a specialty of that sort of thing. "OPPORTUNITIES" get right down to facts and figure, and strives to give its readers real help in directing their efforts. It tells how a person with a little capital may invest it safely to bring a competence. If you are tied down to unhealthful office work, it can show you how to acquire independence and make money in healthful outdoor pursuits. The future possibilities of irrigation for the person of small means will be one of the topics treated. The numerous ways of adding to one's income on the side is a regular department, and also the chances for women in the professions and crafts, as well as at home.
"OPPORTUNITIES" takes occasion to point out to its readers the fake and fraudulent schemes that are advertised so extensively in questionable papers, and in this way alone may save many times its cost to the subscriber. It at all times guards the interests of its subscribers, giving them practical aid in making their lives successful and in avoiding failure. "OPPORTUNITIES" is an honest, practical magazine.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXVII
The Shortest Psalm

PRAISE! PRAISE! PRAISE!

1. O praise the Lord, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people.
2. For his merciful kindness is great toward us: and the truth of the Lord endureth forever. Praise ye the Lord.

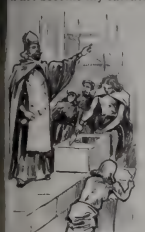
Short in words but long in meaning. The triple trio, Mercy, Kindness and Truth, with Lord, Lord, Lord, and Praise, Praise, Praise, will keep the other trio of Ye, Ye, Ye, busy with doxologies all one's life.

PSALM CXVIII
Corner Stone Psalm

21. I will praise thee: for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation. 22. The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.



"THE HEADSTONE OF THE CORNER"

23. This is the Lord's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes.

Character building is eternal. The Lord is the chief cornerstone. Modern Babel builders leave Him out, but their rejection is to their own hurt, not his, save as it hurts his heart. The names cut in the stone, are Mercy, Trust, Help and Righteousness. Read this Psalm, then the venth of Matthew and you will say with the riter, "God is the Lord, which hath shewed light. For he who builds on the Word of od, builds on rock, not sand."

PSALM CXIX
The Great Psalm

164. Seven times a day do I praise thee, because thy righteous judgments. 165. Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them.

"I HAVE KEPT THY PRECEPTS"

166. Lord, I have hoped for thy salvation, and done thy commandments.
167. My soul hath kept thy testimonies; and I love them exceedingly.
168. I have kept thy precepts and thy testimonies: for all my ways are before thee.

Only God is great, and his Testimonies, Precepts, Commandments, Judgment and Truth are like unto himself. This Psalm is pure gold. It is The Word of God" over and against the ord of man. It is the Law and Liberty of eaven, over and against the license and oseness of earth. The closing verse is the urable of the "ninety and nine," told in brief.

PSALM CXX
Psalm of Distress

1. In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he ard me. 2. Deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.

"IN THE TENTS OF KEDAR"

5. Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar!
6. My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace.
7. I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war.

Distress, sharp arrows, war and woe, are not the most comfortable companions on earth, but thousands have them, have them all, with lying lips and deceitful tongue heaped on. Queer olk who will not be glad to pass the Pearly ate and leave them all outside. A ship in istress is not so bad as a shipwrecked soul. ery Godward is the only sure help.

THE LOAVES AND FISHES*

Christ Requires and Accepts Gifts and Services, which He Makes Adequate to His Purpose

CARE for the physical comfort and thoughtfulness for the physical need of the people, appear in the miracle of the loaves and fishes, as they do in so many of Christ's miracles. If we were in danger of forgetting the human element in his character, his own conduct, as it is described in the Gospels, would remind us of it. While never losing sight of the infinitely greater importance of spiritual over temporal need, and while continually emphasizing the difference, he had a tender regard for physical suffering and evidently delighted in removing it. He might in this case have adopted the suggestion of his disciples, and have sent the crowd away to get food, but it was clearly a pleasure to him, for once, to be a host, and provide a meal for his hearers. How one would have enjoyed tasting that food which was furnished by his love!

There is one impressive aspect of the miracle which Phillips Brooks has presented with great force. It is the question, why Christ used the food that the lad had with him. It was so little compared with the quantity required to feed the vast audience that one wonders why Christ, having to work a miracle, did not disregard the insignificant supply and create all that was necessary. The great preacher pointed out how consistent Christ's act was with his usual manner of working. He loved to have men participate with him in his beneficent acts. What could they bring? It might be so little as to be not worth mentioning; but he preferred to have that little. In his hands it served the purpose. Thus he asked one man, who craved healing at his hands, if he believed. Of another he asked if he was willing to be made whole. So now, in the work of conversion it is so little that we can do, but that little is indispensable. If it is only the desire to be saved, Christ accepts it and proceeds to use it. So in our work for others. Our own efforts are so feeble and ineffective, but Christ prefers to bless them rather than to work directly on the unregenerate soul. How many loaves have ye? What can you bring to him? The poor little talent, the poor gift of a consecrated life, the cup of cold water—it is not worth bringing, but he accepts it, and enlarges and multiplies it.

A Service in Jail

A lady of this city sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the following letter, which may interest readers of this journal:

Dear Christian Herald:—Attending a Sunday morning service in Ludlow Street Jail recently, I was much impressed with the solemnity of such worship as this. The congregation is invisible. Behind the bars, prisoners listen to the simple, earnest sermon by Chaplain Munro, to the prayers that are put up for them, and to the message of the Gospel songs sung by the chaplain and the few earnest workers that go with him. A little hand-organ is sadly needed. Only $35, says Chaplain Munro, would purchase one that would answer, and doubtless kindly friends will soon supply this. Surely if any need to have gloom broken by melody and hearts uplifted by praise, it is the waifs and strays of humanity confined in prison walls. Miss Clara Meyer, organist of Camp Memorial Mission, and Mrs. F. W. Baker, of Brooklyn, and several other Christian ladies, are co-operating with the chaplain in his Sabbath work here. It is to be hoped that many more may become interested.

Answered Prayers

B. I. C., Oneida, N. Y., writes:

For years my husband was most of the time out of work, and we had sickness in the family near unto death. All the hope I had was my faith in prayer. Once my husband was extremely ill, and I prayed earnestly that he might be spared. My prayers were answered, and it led to the conversion of us both. Through prayer our two daughters have been brought into the church

RUINS OF THE ANCIENT CITY OF EPHESUS

IN DIANA'S TEMPLE

REV. EZRA T. SANFORD, whose interesting letter, dated Malta, appeared in a recent issue, supplies, in a later epistle, an account of how things look to-day at other interesting points in his tour of the East:

I have just visited Diana's Temple, and am now sitting in the railroad car with Rev. B. B. Tyler, D.D., of Denver, Colo. On our arrival at Ephesus, we first saw the ancient aqueduct which brought water to the city. On the top of the pillars that supported the arches, the storks have built their nests; westward, we beheld the ancient church of St. John, and, following our guide, came to a Mosque in which are some of the columns of Diana's Temple. The capital I saw was a well-preserved specimen of the architecture of the time of Alexander the Great. Still going westward, we descend into the ruins of Diana's Temple. Here are sections of columns twelve feet below the surface. We went along the old Roman road that led to Miletus, over which the elders passed who were sent for by Paul at the time of his last call there. Crossing the plains and fertile fields, where flourished the ancient gardens connected with Diana's worship, we were soon looking at the ruins of the theatre where Paul was defended by Alexander the Jew.

I surveyed the extensive ruins of ancient Ephesus in company with Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Philadelphia. Although these are the most complete of any visible section of the famous city, yet the most vivid association of the historic past still clings to the broken columns and sculptured capitals. At this place not only did Xerxes and Alexander worship, but here the Apostle Paul instructed concerning the true God, greater than Diana of Ephesus. While I watched Dr. Hoyt trotting his faithful horse along the old Roman road (which is in excellent preservation) towards Miletus, I thought of the elders of Ephesus hastening to meet Paul; and of the tears shed at that sad parting. While I examined the Gate of Persecution, supposed to have been the entrance of St. John's Church, I saw in mind the aged apostle pronouncing his benediction on his disciples here. Through the apostle whom Jesus loved was to come one of the most precious promises of Scripture written on Patmos to the Church at Ephesus: "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

March 3, 8 A.M.—We have just passed the Island of Patmos. It has occurred to me, in the midst of these scenes associated with Paul and John, what a happy name your paper bears: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. John, writing from Patmos, pronounced to ages to come the message: "Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book." When I stood last week on Mars' Hill, the words of the first Christian Herald to the Gentiles of classic and cultured Athens, that God had given "assurance unto all men" in that he raised Christ from the dead, came to my mind. What the world needs to-day is assurance. Read John's first epistle; study Paul's letters, and read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, filled as it is with articles that strengthen faith. Pray till assurance is yours.

Nazareth, March 5.—I must write you just a word from Nazareth, the home of Jesus for nearly thirty years. The well of the city is probably the same visited often by our Lord as he grew to maturity. When we viewed the Mont of Precipitation (from which I now write), a large rabbit jumped out of a small cave, and we thought of the Saviour's words: "The foxes have holes." We had scarcely gone ten rods, when two partridges sprang from their nests among the thorn bushes, and it seemed we heard the words of Jesus saying: "The birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." Our visit to Galilee has been of deepest interest. We found fishermen with their nets upon the shore. The waves were rolling high, and we seemed to hear a voice saying: "Peace, be still."

A Gambler Converted

ACCORDING to police statistics, New York City has ten thousand professional gamblers. But there is probably an equal number of others, mostly young men, who possess the gambling craze and indulge in this sin frequently. Many began at social card parties; then they bet on horse races, and by and by they visited the regular gambling dens and played with experts. With repeated losses they become desperate and resort to crime to get money. The gambler usually ends his life as a suicide, or in jail as a criminal.

"A short time since (writes Rev. Josiah Munro, Chaplain of the Tombs, New York), a young gambler, who gave his heart to God while in prison, wrote me a letter, in which he told of his downfall and how he had been ruined by the passion for gambling. He had robbed his own family, his employer and his friends to get money to play. He lost all he had. In prison he came to himself. He cried to God and found mercy. Then he wrote me a letter from which I quote a few sentences: 'Some months ago it was my misfortune to gain an entrance to one of the places of New York where I spent my time gambling. From that day I forgot my church, my wife and dear children.' Day and night this man spent his time scheming how he might rob people to get money to gamble. His wife entreated him, on her knees, to give up his evil ways and become again a good father and husband as he formerly had been. To this he agreed, and uttered a half-hearted prayer for deliverance from the vice, but only to renew the gambling habit more vigorously the next day. He went on from week to week, breaking his wife's heart and impoverishing his home, until the gambling spirit had completely mastered him. Then he committed a crime that made him a felon. 'The first day of my incarceration,' he writes, 'I had brought before my mind, through the singing of an old hymn, sung by the prison choir, the miserable life I had been living, I had come from a New England home, but had fallen low in sin. In my cell I had time to think over my ungodly life. I determined then and there to ask God's forgiveness.' This was the turning-point in his life. He wept like a child, and made full surrender to the Lord Jesus. He was discharged from prison on a suspended sentence. Next day, I called at his home and he and his family were rejoicing in the Lord Jesus. O, how he poured out his heart to God in an earnest plea to be daily kept by divine power. Jesus saved this gambler. Since his restoration, months ago, he has moved into a better neighborhood and is now doing well, and living a quiet, law-abiding, Christian life."

"Lost in the Storm"

Oh, hark! how the storm is raging without,
Are all of my lambkins in?
Are none of them braving the wind's wild blast?
Are they safe in the shelter from sin?

Nay, did you not hear them without in the storm?
A cry cometh now and again;
"Oh, can you not help us to safety and rest?
To find the Lord's fold we are fain!"

Haste away, 'ere the Shepherd has fastened the door,
Go search for His lambs that are lost;
Bring them into the fold of our Saviour and King,
Swell the number of heaven's glad host.

The above was suggested by one of the ten beautiful pictures in the Family Art Gallery, which came to me as a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. L. M. L.

THE GUIDING HAND

Paul Willing to be the Prisoner of the Lord

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEN the servant of God is fully given over to his Master's service, opportunities of ministry are provided for him. Felix commanded the centurion not to forbid any of Paul's friends to minister to him. And there is little doubt that the church at Cæsarea found opportunity to lighten his imprisonment in many ways. It is more than probable that he also ministered to them, and that out of the prison much precious truth and Bible light went forth to the disciples, and through them to others. A man always in communion with God cannot be without influence. The walls of a prison have no power to shut in the presence of God. Wherever a man or woman, who is filled with the Spirit of God, lives or journeys, there He who makes that body his temple is, too, and "living water" flows out even from a prison where the temple of God dwells.

Something in Paul's defence must have struck the governor, for he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ Jesus." Perhaps Felix had imagined that this man of God would have simply given him a theological discourse, learned and finished, proving point after point, and addressed to the intellect alone. But the man was unprepared to find that he was face to face with no mere man, but a man in whom God dwelt—a man who was the temple of the Holy Ghost. Paul "reasoned of righteousness." Not only was it a higher standard than Felix had yet known, but as the man of God opened the wondrous story of the Gospel of the grace of God, he could not but see that it appealed to him; that this Gospel was meant for him, and that he might, he ought to, he was then called to, forsake his sins, and be saved from them through believing in Jesus. When the prisoner before him reasoned of "temperance," of moral purity and sobriety, and all that is included in "self-control" (R.V.), he began to feel that prick in the heart which made it impossible to evade the direct conviction of the Spirit of God, "Thou art the man."

And when Paul opened before him "the judgment to come," the very Christ whom the Jews had crucified sitting on the throne of his glory to judge, going into every word and action, and every secret thought, terror took hold upon the man—he felt he must yield, or get away from the sound and the message which appalled him. Alas, he did not yield! He did not wait for Paul to finish. As he reasoned . . . Felix answered and said, Go thy way for this time, and when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." Miserable man! he spoke as though it were a matter only between him and Paul, between man and man. But when the great day of account opens, and Felix is brought to judgment, it will not be Paul, but his Master, who will say, "Felix, you put me off when I would have saved you; you let your chance go by. There is no convenient season now—you have chosen, and you have your choice."

It was not his last interview with Paul; he sent for him the oftener and communed with him, hoping for money to be given him. With such a thought in his heart, after having been brought under the power of God, no wonder that we hear nothing of his conversion. A new-born soul esteems the truth of God as "silver" and as "hid treasures" (Prov. 2: 4). Felix detained Paul for two years in Cæsarea: it was needful in order that his life should bear witness to the truth of his words, written only a year or two before to the Romans: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are called according to his purpose." Times of waiting, testing, enduring, are not lost time; in the end we shall find that it is in these things, and not in those when we were most consciously serving God, that he was the best enabled to conform us to the image of his Son. Many a one comes out from a time of very fruitful service with some savor of self; but out of the school of a crossed will, a tried patience, a closely-tested love, an understood and accepted humiliation come Christ-like acts.

No sooner had Festus, who succeeded Felix, come into the province, than he visited Jerusalem, and the chief priests and elders lost no time in informing him against Paul, and requested that he might be brought to Jerusalem. But it was with the intent to waylay and murder him. Festus would not yield to them, although we are not told that he was aware of the murderous intent of the Jews. One thing we know, that He who watched over Paul, did not will that he should be slain at that time. Festus called on those who were of power among them to go down with him to Cæsarea, so that if there was any cause of complaint, they might accuse him. How many might say: What a loss of time! Surely God could have hastened matters so that Paul's valuable labors might be resumed! But God knows when persons and things are ripe; He who times the stars and the comets can regulate his children and his work.

After eight or ten days, the new governor went down to Cæsarea, and on the morrow he sat on the judgment seat, and Paul's case came on, but was not adjudicated there.

RHEUMATISM
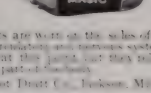
WITHOUT MEDICINE

External Remedy so successful that the makers send it ON APPROVAL to anybody.

Magic Foot Drafts, the new remedy for rheumatism which has created such a furore throughout Michigan by relieving all kinds of rheumatism, no matter how severe or chronic, are now being sent all over the world on approval without a cent in advance. The sufferer is put upon honor to pay one dollar for the drafts if satisfied with the relief they give, otherwise no money is asked. This plan is a novel one and would result in enormous loss if the drafts did not afford immediate and permanent relief. The remarkable success of the plan proves not only this, but also is a glowing tribute to the honesty of the American people.



The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet because the circulatory and nervous systems are most accessible at this point, and thus relief can be instantaneous all over the body.

Magic Foot Draft Co., Jackson, Mich.

Gentlemen:

I received the trial pair of Drafts and will not forget them during the time I am subject to rheumatism. They relieved me in short order and I am recommending them to my friends.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

U. W., Bearcreek, N. C. What is the meaning of the expression in Isaiah 7:20, that God would shave with a razor that is hired?

The passage is its own explanation. It is that God would use Assyria to chastise and punish his people. The loss of the beard among the Jews was considered an indignity and a disgrace. Evil was to come upon them, and Assyria would be the instrument in God's hand of inflicting it. The Assyrians were not his servants, and did not know that in attacking Israel they were doing God's will. They were hired, in the sense that they received compensation in plunder, not as God's children obeying him, but as strangers who were hired and paid for performing a special task.

Mrs. J. H. F., Jr., Watervliet, N. Y. 1. What were the dates of Paul's first, second and third missionary journeys? 2. The dates of each Epistle and where they were written from?

1. Paul's introduction by the sacred historian (when he was a witness of Stephen's martyrdom), is supposed to have been about A.D. 36. At that time he was probably between thirty and forty years of age. His conversion took place A.D. 37. He left Damascus A.D. 37. First missionary journey undertaken A.D. 44; his second, three years later, and his third, four years after the second. 2. There is no certainty about the dates of the Pauline Epistles, but the following dates have been fixed upon as approximately correct:

EPISTLE	WRITTEN IN	YEAR
Romans	Corinth	A.D. 58
Galatians	Corinth	58
Ephesians	Rome	62
I. Corinthians	Ephesus	57
II. Corinthians	Philippi	57
Philippians	Rome	62
I. Timothy	Rome	64
II. Timothy	Rome	66
Titus	Rome	64
I. Thessalonians	Corinth	52
II. Thessalonians	Corinth	52
Colossians	Rome	62
Philemon	Rome	62

C. W. G., Toronto, Can. Of what is the hare at Easter a symbol? It seems associated with eggs.

From remotest antiquity, the egg, holder of the germ of existence and type of the universe, and the hare, type of the light-giver in darkness (the moon, in which its picture was supposed to have been seen), and in itself of abounding fruitfulness, have been symbols of life's renewal, and thus appropriate to Easter. Their conjunction in ornamental devices and in folklore, naturally followed the continued employment of the two as Easter symbols.

M. A. B., Albany. What noted American poet was buried at Westminster Abbey?

James Russell Lowell and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow each have memorials there, but were not buried there.

J. D. G., Gardiner, Me. The laws of God being unchangeable, why should there not be visions, appearance of angels, speaking in unknown tongues, miracles, etc., as in former times?

In one sense, of course, God's laws are unchangeable; they are always wise, beneficent and righteous; but it does not follow that he always deals with men in the same way. There is an obvious growth in the development of his revelation of himself which you can trace in the Bible. Moses and Samuel and David and the prophets had not so clear an idea of him as we get in Jesus Christ. It is as with the education of a child. In his early years we teach him by pictures and stories, but as he grows older we leave all that behind. Christ was clearly hurt by the craving of the people to see miracles performed. Paul had but a low estimate of the value of the tongues (see I. Cor. 14:19). God in our age is dealing with men in preaching and by the Holy Spirit. As Abraham said to Dives, "If men believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be convinced though one rose from the dead."

G. H. E., Sterling, O. T. Does Christ command us in Matt. 6:24-34 to make no provision for sickness or old age? If so, how do Christians justify themselves in saving up money?

Christ's teaching, in the passage you quote, is against making the acquisition of money the chief end in life. It is against anxiety and worry that he warns us. The first thing to be sought is character, not property. It is those people whose thoughts are continually concentrated on worldly success, who live for business and neglect their souls, who are warned in the passage. They are reminded that their first duty is to seek the Kingdom of God, and, that if they do so, they may safely leave the future in his hands without apprehension. Honest work and thrift and provision for future emergencies are in no case condemned, but rather encouraged in the Bible. "He that provideth not for his own family," Paul says, "is worse than an infidel" (I. Tim. 5:8).

Helen D., Memphis, Tenn. Kindly state who wrote the hymn "Stand up, Stand up for Jesus"? Also state something of the circumstances under which it was composed.

It was written by the Rev. George Duffield, a Presbyterian pastor in Philadelphia, in 1858. He delivered it as a peroration at the close of a sermon addressed to the Y. M. C. A. The sermon was based on the dying words of the Rev. D. A. Tyng, who was asked a few moments before he expired if he had any message for the young men. He replied in a whisper: "Tell them to stand up for Jesus." This was the theme of Mr. Duffield's discourse. His hymn has been translated into many languages, and sung all over the world.

M. M., Bloomingdale, Mich. 1. What kinds of flowers were those Dr. Klopsch saw in Finland? 2. Is the spirit spoken of in Acts 2:17 and other places, now in the world? 3. Who is represented by the Beast mentioned in Rev. 14:9?

1. This and other questions relating to Finland are being fully answered in the series of letters by Dr. Klopsch, now appearing in this journal. 2. The Holy Spirit is certainly working in our time. The manifestation differs in different ages, but, as Paul said, the Spirit is one and the same, and is adapted to the needs of the time. No conversion ever occurs without the Holy Spirit's power and influence. 3. The Beast is generally understood by students of prophesy to mean the final incarnation of Satanic power, which will precede the second coming of Christ. It is to be an attempt to establish a world-wide empire. Daniel also gives a description of it (Daniel 11:19-42).

Reader, Sheridan, Mont. Is a husband justified in denying his wife the privilege of doing Christian work?

Our first duty, man or woman, is to God and our conscience. No one has a moral or legal right to stand between us and the performance of that duty.

G. K., Des Moines, Ia. In view of the fact that Christ's kingdom is to be a kingdom of peace, how are we to understand his warning (Matt. 10:34, 35), that he had come not to send peace on earth, but a sword?

Christ's work on the individual soul may help you to understand his meaning. The converted soul enjoys a peace passing all understanding; but how is it attained? The first stages of the process are those of fierce conflict. See the agony, the distress that the majority of men pass through when they are under conviction. It is through conflict that peace is attained. It is so with the evil in the world. Christ's kingdom is, as you say, one of peace; but not the despicable peace with wickedness and oppression. With those evils there must be war. If a father wisely loves his son, he does not ignore that son's bad ways; he punishes him in order to save him. You may say how do we reconcile the rod in the father's hand with his love for his child. There is no need to reconcile. The rod is a sign and proof of the father's love. So Christ's coming brought a sword to smite the evil that is cursing the world.

Miriam, Germantown, Pa. Who wrote: "As the marsh-grass sends roots into the sod, I will take hold on the goodness of God"? It is a poem, I think, called "The Marsh-Hen."

Perhaps this, by Sidney Lanier, in "The Marshes of Glynn," is what you are thinking of:

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
Behold, I will build me a nest on the greatness of God.
I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies
In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies:
By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod
I will heartily lay me ahold on the greatness of God.

W. P. C., Deer Harbor, Wash. Is a church still an organization which has had no business meeting, or religious service of any kind for nearly three years?

Yes, but a moribund organization, and one which could be legally dissolved upon the application of any one or more parties in interest.

Mrs. H. J. Van R., Portland, Me. Concerning the book on domestic accounts, Earl's Housekeeping, I am at loss to conjecture in what way it leads to economy, which, after all, is one of the main results a housekeeper looks for

To this there can be no better reply than the following extract from the letter of a housekeeper in Montclair, N. J., who has used this method of home accounts for the past three years: "At first start, Earl's plan of housekeeping merely interested me from the mechanical accuracy with which it laid down the various forms taken by the small stream of wealth set flowing from my pocketbook; but, bye and bye, it began to demonstrate to me disconcerting comparisons of different week's expenditures—food, for instance—and this led to investigation, and then to the discovery of reckless expenditure, improvident outlay and extravagant waste. Unconsciously, as the weeks went by, my knowledge and experience became more and more mature and my weekly expenditures were fewer and better regulated."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IN YELLOWSTONE PARK

The photograph shows the President addressing a gathering at Gardner, Mont., at the laying of the corner-stone of the new entrance to the Yellowstone Park. He spent a two weeks' holiday in the Park, but did no hunting. He spoke to large audiences at Cinnabar and other places outside the Park, the people coming from long distances to greet him.

Rev. H. B. E., Perth Amboy, N. J. I notice the inquiry, "How long has the cut-flower industry been pursued in the United States," and your reply, "Fifty years ago it would not have been possible to purchase cut-flowers during the winter season in any of the large cities of this country." Allow me to say, that sixty-four years ago I was in the habit of going out to Hogg's garden and greenhouse, near what is now Thirty-fifth street, in the early winter mornings, to purchase bouquets of a variety of flowers, to throw into the window of a fair maiden, on my way down town to Columbia College, then under its noble elms below Chambers street. The garden had been in existence then many years. This was not peculiar to New York. I am sure the same could be said of other large cities at that period.

THE RAILWAY SQUARE IN HELSINGFORS, CAPITAL OF FINLAND

OUR TOUR THROUGH STRICKEN FINLAND

By DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH

I.—In Helsingfors

JUST returned from my tour of inspection of the famine fields and relief operations in Finland and Sweden, I hasten to report the result of my observations to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose generous contributions made possible the extensive relief measures which effectually checked the ravages of hunger and destitution, and unquestionably averted the fearful mortality which otherwise must have ensued.

The party which left New York for the famine districts consisted, as already published in this journal, of Mr. Gilson Willets, an American journalist, and the writer. Our first stop was Hamburg, and thence 2,000 miles by rail to St. Petersburg.

We had at first planned to go direct to Helsingfors, by way of Copenhagen, but in view of the present unfortunate political situation in Finland, and her very much strained relations with the Imperial Government, we determined to enter Russia by the front door, and thus escape the possible imputation of political motives to our purely philanthropic mission.

The Journey from St. Petersburg

At St. Petersburg we had interesting interviews with Hon. Robert S. McCormick, the American Ambassador; Count Andre Bobrinskoy, Russia's foremost philanthropist; Admiral Craemer, President of the Russian Red Cross Society and Chairman of the Russian Finland Relief Committee, and Rev. J. D. Kilburn, formerly pastor of the English-American Church in St. Petersburg. To each of these gentlemen we are greatly indebted for excellent information and advice, which materially aided us in our subsequent operations. We then continued the journey, leaving St. Petersburg in the evening and arriving at Helsingfors early the next forenoon. We drove at once to the Societetshuset (hotel) and requested that Professor Saltzman, Chairman of the Central Relief Committee, be notified by telephone of our arrival. While awaiting his reply I looked out of the window, and found myself confronted with the Gulf of Finland, covered with a solid ice crust, twenty inches thick, and that again with an equal depth of snow.

Professor Saltzman arrived at two o'clock. He is tall, stout, dignified, and confidence-inspiring. He stands very high indeed in the councils of his people. There is probably not another man in all Finland who is more universally beloved and respected. After cordial greetings and expressions of highest appreciation of American generosity, sympathy and kindness, Professor Saltzman gave me an intelligent and comprehensive survey of famine conditions, the details of which coincided closely with those already published broadcast in the columns of the American press.

"When we were first confronted with famine conditions in the northern part of our country," said the Professor, "we made every reasonable effort to relieve the situation, without asking for aid. We had a fund of 250,000 marks ($50,000) provided for that particular purpose, and our people here in the south made very generous contributions of money, grain and clothing, aggregating nearly 1,000,000 marks ($200,000), but the famine area grew so fast and the number of dependents increased so rapidly, that we soon discovered that, unaided, we could not successfully contend. It was just at that disheartening point in our relief operations when the kind-hearted people of America offered to aid us in the unequal struggle. And as their assistance was voluntary and without any direct appeal from us, we concluded, not without some hesitation and reluctance, in view of the prevailing conditions and an impending large mortality from starvation, that we would gratefully receive and conscientiously administer what the good people of your country might be willing to send. It was then that I sent you my cablegram that American assistance would be heartily welcomed."

THE ALEXANDER II. STATUE, HELSINGFORS

Erected in 1894, to commemorate his friendship for Finland

In response to my inquiries, Dr. Saltzman located the famine area in the Provinces of Kuopia and Uleaborg, and stated that the population of the famine districts was variously estimated at from 275,000 to 400,000, the variation depending chiefly on the date of the information, and that the conditions in many parts were very, very distressing. He regretted that the suffering was on the increase, both as to intensity and extent, and Helsingius, the leading authority on famine affairs, later on fully corroborated this view.

Meeting the Finnish Committee

The Professor then invited us to a Committee meeting on the following evening, and volunteered to submit detailed reports of the relief operations and of the finances of the Committee.

The Central Relief Committee, consisting of about thirty representative, sympathetic and intelligent men and women, was fully represented at the regular meeting. When we arrived, they accorded us a hearty welcome, and we took the places reserved for us at the right and left of the Chairman. Dr. Saltzman delivered an address, in the course of which he again feelingly referred to the deep impression American sympathy and generosity had made on the hearts of the Finnish people, who were sincerely grateful for this practical manifestation of Christian and brotherly interest.

A more admirable relief system than that employed by the Committee cannot be conceived, and our visit to Finland was an education in the most enlightened application of practical charity. Relief is afforded in three ways:

1. Gratuitous relief to the aged, the sick, and children.
2. Home work for those who own no land.
3. Conditional loans, without interest, to impoverished farmers.

Class 1. Apply either in person, or by letter, to the Local Committee, or are reported by neighbors, or discovered by traveling inspectors. The relief is afforded invariably in the shape of "committee flour," which, supplying the staff of life, would render any little funds these sufferers might be able to command, available for milk, medicine, clothing, and other necessaries; but in nearly every case later on visited by us, we discovered that the impoverishment was so complete, that even babies had not tasted milk for months.

Class 2. Consists of farm laborers and mechanics, with their wives, sons, and daughters. Before the operations of the Committee commenced, the men would leave home and travel twenty, or thirty, or forty miles in quest of work, with a view to sending part of the wages home to the family, rarely, however, finding what they sought, or, if successful, then only at such small pay, that the end of the week found them poorer than when they started. Hence, there are even now thousands of homes in Finland from which the men are absent, either seeking work, or, having found it, are unable to contribute to the support of their destitute families at home. To relieve this situation, and to do so without robbing the people of their self-respect, or teaching them to depend on gratuitous relief, the Committee devised a system of home industries that solved the problem admirably, acceptably, and effectively. It includes making fishing nets, weaving cloth or carpets, and the making of wooden spades, rough sledges, snow-shoes, rakes, hay-forks, and knit slippers. The Local Committee supplies the material, and pays for the work done, selling the goods at, sometimes, the mere cost of the raw material. The work is such that every member of the family may assist, and this keeps them all busy—and, better still, it keeps them at home, and thus prevents their becoming tramps. This plan is very laborious and trying, but the results have demonstrated that it is worthy the effort, and it will well repay study at the hands of practical philanthropists.

Class 3. Pertains to small landholders, and the relief measure, an unusually excellent one, consists of a conditional loan, without interest, of from eighty to four hundred marks ($16 to $80), eighty per. cent. in flour and twenty per cent. in cash, with the distinct understanding that the person receiving it is impoverished through famine, and that he will improve his own property to an extent as would require enough work at a low scale of wages to earn the full amount of the loan. This work is designated by traveling Agranoms, engaged for the purpose, who visit the farm and point out the doors or fences that shall be repaired, the soil that shall be mixed or fertilized, the barns or outhouses that shall be erected, and such other improvements as they may deem desirable. If these improvements be promptly made, and the improved condition of affairs be satisfactorily maintained, an allowance will be made at the end of the first year equal to 25 per cent. of the loan; at the end of the second year, the improvements being maintained, another 25 per cent. is deducted, and at the end of the third year the repayment of the remaining 50 per cent. must begin, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum—all without interest charges. The money thus repaid is to be used as the nucleus of an Emergency Fund, in case of a recurrence of famine conditions.

An Avalanche of Appeals

The Committee adopted unanimously a vote of thanks to the American people, and instructed its Secretary to forward a copy of the resolution to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

A SCENE IN THE FISH-MARKET, HELSINGFORS

Before I left the hall, they had designated Dr. J. N. Reuter, a Professor at the Helsingfors University (but not a member of the Committee), to accompany us in behalf of the Committee on our tour of inspection through the famine districts of Finland.

The day after our arrival the Helsingfors' journals editorially commended the generous-hearted people of America, and our trip was the universal topic. As a result of this publicity we were literally overrun with beggars, applicants for relief, and messengers from various parts of the country, who had hastened thither to inform us concerning the condition of their particular section, and to assign multitudinous reasons why they should receive first consideration at our hands. Over 150 persons called the first day, and of this number we could see, of course, only a few. As the distribution of relief did not rest with us, but with the Central Relief Committee, we were compelled to refer the applicants to Dr. Saltzman, the Chairman. Letters innumerable poured in from everywhere; but being written in Finnish or in Swedish, neither of which languages we understood, action on these had to be deferred to a more convenient season.

Before leaving Helsingfors, we made several visits to persons well informed concerning the condition of the interior. Among others, we called on the American Consul, who received us cordially and gave us valuable information; but for by far the most exhaustive details in regard to famine conditions, we were deeply indebted to Col. Poulson of the Salvation Army, and to his excellent wife, both of whom were exceptionally well informed on the true situation, and freely placed their knowledge and services at our disposal.

We spent two days in making the necessary preparations for the journey into the interior. Snow was twenty inches deep, and what the weather might be no one could foretell with any degree of accuracy.

Off for the Frozen North

So we provided fur coats, mittens, storm-caps, boots and rubbers, and laid in a stock of provisions sufficient to meet the requirements of four men for at least two weeks. Arrangements were made by wire for three sledges at Edensalmi—the last railroad station—one sled for Mr. Willets and myself, one for Dr. J. N. Reuter and Mr. Robert Alopaeus, Superintendent of Industrial Schools, who were to accompany us, and one for the baggage and supplies. All our trunks were sent to Stockholm, and each of us started out with only one suit of clothing, so as to reduce to a minimum the baggage to be carried. The arrangements completed, we purchased our railroad tickets, and on Tuesday, March 3, at 9:30 P.M., started from the hotel to take the 10 o'clock train from Helsingfors to Edensalmi.

We all dreaded the trip, and I cannot say that we left the pleasant Societetshuset in a particularly happy frame of mind. The country, the people, the language, the customs, were all strange to us, and the prospect of traveling, day in and day out, over dreary wastes of snow, dotted with pine groups, away from railroad, telegraph and telephones, eating salt meats and canned goods, sleeping in post-houses of the exact nature of which we were ignorant, with the probability of frigid weather, was not especially inviting, and when revolvers, fully loaded, made their appearance, to be used in case of attack by robbers or wolves, it became even more forbidding. Personally, I refused to purchase or receive fire-arms, and I am more than happy to be able to report that not a shot was fired during the whole journey.

When we arrived at the Helsingfors station, a delightful surprise awaited us. The Committee, headed by Professor Saltzman, the Mayor, a number of Senators, Col. Poulson, and a vast host of people, had gathered to see us off. Fifty young ladies, each bearing a tiny bouquet, with the stems held in a small colored glass receptacle with a wire collar, the end of which was shaped into a hook, were in the centre of the station, and as I shook hands with the Professor, they advanced and fastened the hooks into my overcoat, literally covering my chest with flowers. Thus adorned, in accord with the custom of manifesting appreciation, in vogue in Finland, and much to my personal embarrassment, I was led to the platform. Here about three thousand people had gathered. The moment I arrived, the Helsingfors Male Chorus—said to be the finest in Europe—began to sing. Notwithstanding wintry times, all hats were removed. After they had sung three or four times, I addressed the gathering, telling them that while I felt personally unworthy of this demonstration, I accepted it as intended for the American people, to whom I would faithfully report this manifestation of gratitude and appreciation. Then the Male Chorus sang the Finnish National Air (prohibited by the Russian Government), and while they were yet singing, and the people shouting, "God bless you!" the train drew out of the station, and we were on our way to the famine fields in the interior.

Our experiences there will be recorded in the next letter.

Dr. W. T. Grenfell's Voyages Among the Fishermen off the Northeastern Coast of Our Continent

SEE PICTURES ON FIRST PAGE

ONE of the most arduous and useful spheres of Gospel mission work on this side the Atlantic, is that under the charge of Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, who, during his recent visit to New York, kindly furnished us with the accompanying illustrations, and with a description of the strange people among whom he labors, and of the efforts being made for their physical and spiritual benefit. Dr. Grenfell's work is part of that noble and self-sacrificing organization in which the late Queen Victoria took so deep an interest, and to which, by her special desire, the name was given of "The Royal National Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen." It has been in operation since 1881 in European waters, and its valuable and beneficent services are attested by thousands of grateful souls. It combines medical with spiritual service, and renders aid of many other kinds to men who spend most of their lives on the deep, far away from religious opportunities. The people reached by the Mission are on board fishing-vessels dotting the seas from Iceland on the North, to the Bay of Biscay on the South, and from the Hebrides on the West, to the coast of Norway on the East. The Mission has now thirteen vessels afloat rendering help to these men, and of these four are practically floating-hospitals.

Not least among the achievements of these floating Gospel mission boats is that they have completely ousted the vessels carrying grog, which formerly visited the fishing fleets, doing untold mischief. Not only has temperance literature been distributed, and a temperance society formed, but temperance institutes have been established at the ports frequented by the fishermen, in each of which there are conveniences for letter writing, for amusement and entertainment which are a counter attraction to the saloon. How necessary these institutes were, was easily realized by the missionaries who saw the temptations to which the fishermen were exposed, when, after months of isolation, they received their money in a lump and went ashore. The Mission's vessels carry a dispensary, a supply of warm clothing, which is sold at low prices to men who have lost a coat or other garment during the season, quantities of wholesome literature, and games of all kinds to make an evening on the Mission vessel attractive to the men. With all this, the main object, always kept clearly in view, is to make these subsidiary benefits the means of getting the confidence and good-will of the fishermen in order to lead them to Christ.

So successful had been the work in the European seas, that in 1892 Sir Francis Hopwood urged the Council of the Mission to undertake a similar Mission among the fishermen of the North West Atlantic waters, and he made an offer of money to defray the initial cost. His offer was joyfully accepted, and the Council commissioned one of its vessels for the purpose. Dr. Grenfell having the rare combination of qualities enabling him to act as sea-captain, surgeon and evangelist, was an ideal officer to take charge, and to him the conduct of the work was intrusted.

"I sailed from Yarmouth, England," says Dr. Grenfell, "in our largest hospital ketch, ninety-seven tons gross register, and cruised during the summer off the Newfoundland and Labrador shores, among the numberless fishing craft from Newfoundland, Canada and America.

"I embodied my impressions in a report to the Governor of Newfoundland. Briefly, they were as follows:

"1. That some 30,000 fishermen, with women and children, were scattered from five to six months along a barren, rocky shore, of over 1,000 miles, every summer. That there were besides some three to four thousand settlers who followed trafficing in the winter months, and also some 2,000 Eskimo.

THE HOSPITAL STEAMER, "STRATHCONA"

"2. That there were practically none of the amenities of civilization on the coast. Most of the people lived in mud bunk houses. No sanitary precautions whatever were taken. Practically no medical help whatever was available, though their calling especially exposed them to perils of all kinds, and 900 cases of accident and disease treated on board in three months, showed the need of better provision.

"3. As for the settlers, they were miserably poor, the result, we believed, of the 'truck' system of trade, which was universal. They appeared to possess a capacity for earning enough to live on at reasonable rates. We saw true scurvy for want of proper food, and filth diseases for want of sufficient clothing. While on a coast, where, if anywhere on earth, the air should be free of microbes, tubercular diseases were far beyond the average in other countries.

"4. A very large proportion of the populace were illiterate, and those who could read, were losing the capacity for want of material to exercise it on. The people had no games or sports whatever—a bad sign anywhere. Many appeared to have become largely hopeless of ever doing more than acquire enough poor flour, molasses and tea, with perhaps salt pork, to eke out an existence, rather than a living.

"5. The floating population, who came to and fro, were better off. But we believed much could be done to make their lot happier, healthier and more human, and that it ought to be done.

"We began our work the next year by building a Mission hospital on an island at the north entrance to the straits of Belle Isle, and commencing a second one two hundred miles further north, on an island at the entrance to the great Hamilton Inlet. For each of these a qualified doctor and a trained nurse, each imbued with a missionary spirit, came out with us from England. We also brought out a small steam launch to assist the sailing vessel and to enable us to reach many settlements a sailing vessel could never hope to reach in the time. Some two thousand patients were treated, and the ship pushed north as far as Hopedale, the southern station of the Moravian missionaries. Since then, we visit down to Cape Chidley, in Hudson Bay straits.

"The following year we opened the Southern hospital for summer and winter work. Its doors have never been closed from that day, and it has been hospital, hostel, and the only resource in extremity of hundreds, and even thousands, of distressed humanity since. In winter, the doctor travels the coast with dog-sleigh and komatik, while the Sister keeps watch and ward at the hospital, adding to her other duties sewing classes, reading classes, night school, lending library, and using all the available agents at her command as levers to elevate whoever she can reach. Besides the fishermen, we have all the surgical care of some two thousand Eskimos, among whom the devoted Moravian missionaries have five mission stations, churches and schools.

"Our next move was to replace the obsolete sailing vessel by a steamer, and stop the waste of energy in sailing in and out from England every year, by laying her up on the coast as soon as the sea froze over. The charts of this coast are very poor. The ice is floe ice—remains very late in summer, and a stream of icebergs

The Advancing Generations

TEXT—EXODUS 14: 15: "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward"

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, in some respects the greatest warrior of modern times, once declared: "There sometimes comes a crisis in a battle or campaign, when victory, as a bird, will hover over the standards of that general who has brains and grit enough to give the command, 'Forward, march!'" This was the way the French commander defeated the two great wings of the Austrian army at Montenotte and Ceva. This was the way he won his battles at Arcola and Marengo and Wagram. This was the way he tried to win Waterloo, when he commanded Marshal Ney to lead the Old Guard against the solid squares of the British infantry. And this was the way Moses, the great law-giver and soldier, led the children of Israel out of Egypt, over the sands and on through the Red Sea, and freed them from the onrushing charge of the pursuing Egyptians.

But the divine command given to the children of Israel "that they go forward," is applicable to the children of God at the present time. I believe we are at a crisis in the world's history. In 1890, my father preached a sermon, entitled, "Last Decade of the Century." By it he tried to show how easily the world could be brought to Christ within ten years, if every Christian would annually bring only one soul to Christ, and these new converts in turn would also individually bring one soul to Christ every following year. But to-day, I want to show that the world can be brought to Christ even in less time than that, if the Christian church will only realize its full opportunity, and grasp it. I want to show this, because I believe all the great preliminary battles have been fought and won which are necessary for this final triumph. As Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill, and Princeton, and Saratoga had to precede the Yorktown surrender, so I would trace the great onward movements of the human race to show how we are fast approaching the golden milestone, where the world can be redeemed from sin. Then I would try to show how the Anglo-Saxon race, as a human agency, can take the chief part in this gladsome and world-wide triumph, if we will only move forward in God's name.

Victories Already Won

The first great battle for the world's redemption was fought and won when every man's fireside became his "City of Refuge," or his impregnable castle, from which no feudal lord or arbitrary chieftain could dislodge him. It was won when a husband and a father could walk into his home and shut the door, and defy the great wide world, as he said: "These goods are mine. This wife is mine. These children are mine, and no man dare touch them." It was won when an honest man, no matter how humble he might be, had a right in fee simple to the property which his energy had earned, to the woman whom he had led to the marriage altar, and to the children who were born to them.

The right of a man to own his own home, and to have an exclusive claim over his wife and children, are recognized in every civilized land. We have all read the story of the "Miller and the Emperor." Frederick the Great wanted to enlarge his palace grounds. A miller owned a little patch of land near the royal domain. The king offered to buy it. The miller would not sell. The king offered three, four, five times the value of the property. The miller still refused. That land was to him above the value of money. It represented to him the home of his childhood and the home of his ancestors. "Then," said the king, "I will confiscate your land and take it forcibly from you." "Then," said the miller to the king, "I will go to law and compel you to give me back my property." The king was helpless. He knew that in Prussia the king might sit upon a throne, but there was a power greater than the king. That one was the law protecting the man entrenched behind the impregnable walls of his own home.

But this condition of individual rights of a man and of a family did not always exist in the human race. There was a time when the name of husband and wife did not mean what they do to-day. "There was a time," wrote Sir John Lubbock in his book, entitled, The Origin of Civilization, "when in many tribes the children took the name of the mother instead of the father, because the name of the father was never known." There was a time when, by the old feudal system, the corner-stone of society was not in the home of the laborer, but in the castled walls of the nearby ruling lord. The feudal lord not only owned his people's cattle, and sheep, and horses, but if he wished, he could do what he would with his serf's wife and children. There was a time when every woman became by law the wife of every male member of her tribe and every man the husband of every female member. Thus the communism of the brute prevailed. Thus the human being was an animal, a beast pure and simple. Even down to Bible times, we find that Abraham was not only the husband of Sarah, but also the father of Ishmael, by his handmaiden, Hagar. David and Solomon were the husbands of many wives. But now the condition of society is all changed. The marital status has gone back to the Edenic state. Now by law there is only one husband for one wife, and one wife for one husband. It has gone back to the ideal condition God first ordained, which the Psalmist described when he wrote: "God setteth the solitary in families." Such being the social condition among the civilized races, I believe we are one and all ready to grant, that no class of men are more willing to recognize their responsibility to God than those who conscientiously try to fulfil their responsibilities in family life.

Intolerance Shackled

The next great battle for the world's redemption was fought and won when the frowning walls of religious intolerance were battered down, and the torture dungeons of the Dark Ages were forever opened to the purifying light. Ah, the battle for religious liberty was a long and a bitter struggle! It was not won in a day, a decade, a generation, or a century. It fought its way through the flying stones and the bloody swords and the spears, and the martyrdoms of Christians of Apostolic times. The fight for emancipation went on among the crackling flames of burning Rome. It clutched by their throats the man-eating monsters that leaped into the Roman Coliseum. It defied the lowering looks, and the blasphemous oaths of the mobs that gathered in the Florentine square of beautiful Italy to see Savonarola die. It suffered all the agonies which Fox recorded in his History of the Lives and Sufferings, and Triumphant Deaths of the Primitive, as well as the Protestant Martyrs. It steeled the backbone of lion-hearted Martin Luther, as well as of John Huss. It fought its battle until at last the opened Bible was placed in the hand of the common people, and every man was free to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, whether in the Christian Church, the Jewish Temple, or the Mohammedan Mosque.

No man can be said to worship God in sincerity and truth unless he bows before the Mercy Seat under the impulse of a free will. When Torquemada headed the Inquisition, and Charles the Ninth was drunk with human blood, and "Bloody Mary" signed the death warrant of over three hundred martyrs, and Charlemagne forcibly drove the people of his kingdom into the rivers, where, like struggling cattle, the priests baptized them by the wholesale, fear may have made the frightened men and women bow and profess Christ, but fear never yet made a true Christian. You cannot terrorize a man into the kingdom of God with the executioner's axe, or the slave-master's lash. The Bible is full of the Gospel invitations "to come," "Come, for all things are now ready. Come; come; come!" But upon no page of the Bible can you find anywhere the words written, "Come to Christ against your will!" "Come with hate in your heart!" "Come with defying sin on your lips!" "Come, as a trembling murderer is led to the scaffold, or to incarceration for life." Thus, we find that the second great onward movement for the world's redemption was taken when Bigotry's swarthy limbs were manacled, when the hissing tongue of Persecution was stilled, and when Religious Liberty could lift up her smiling face towards the heavens, and stretch forth her white hands to lead, as well as to protect, a free human race.

Pioneer Commercial Union

The next great onward movement for the world's redemption is to be found in the commercial supremacy which has brought all the five continents and the islands of the sea into sympathetic touch. There was a time when a man rarely traveled one hundred miles from the place where he was born. His grave was dug only a short distance from where the tree was planted out of which his cradle was cut. The world was not only divided into nations, but the nations into distinct and antagonistic clans. The Scotchman born in the highlands could not understand the dialect of the Lowlanders. But now, everywhere, commercialism is making of one blood all nations that dwell upon the face of the earth. The American sailor's "Yo, heave!" is heard by the wharves of Tarshish. The East Indian merchantmen, and the ships for China and Japan, and the Philippines, and Australia, and New Zealand, follow each other through the Suez Canal. The railroads of Brazil, and the steamship lines of Chili and Buenos Ayres, and Capetown are owned by foreign capital. The Russian warships are being built in the American shipyards. A great international war is becoming more and more an impossibility, because the Turkish mortgages are held in Paris, Berlin, and London, and Wall Street, and the foreign capitalists must rise or fall together.

But from a spiritual standpoint, why do we say that a great battle was won because commercialism has brought all the world into sympathetic touch? Is the cable sunken under the seas, the telegraphic wires strung overhead, the railroad lines bringing New York and San Francisco into closer communication than were once New York and Georgia, and the great steamboat lines turning all oceans into ferries—are any of these to have anything to do with the advent of the millennial dawn? Is that wonderful invention of Johannes Gutenberg called printing, the outgrowth of which is the modern newspaper press, to have no part in the world's redemption? Oh, yes. The Bible does not say that the world shall grow gradually better and better. But it does say that when the "Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come." And how can that Gospel be preached quicker to all people than through the medium of the telegraph, and telephone, and railroad train, and passenger steamboat lines, and freight boats? When the revision of the New Testament was completed some years ago, was not the Book telegraphed verbatim in one night from New York to Chicago? And can we not, through the conquest of a mercenary commercialism, scatter, practically in the twinkling of an eye, the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the furthermost parts of the earth, so that whole nations shall be born in a day?

Another great preliminary battle for the world's redemption was fought and won when the Parliament of Religions assembled at the World's Fair in Chicago. Then all the intelligent members of the Anglo-Saxon race realized, as never before, that the Gospel of Jesus Christ was not only the best of all religions, but also that it is the only Gospel which promises perfect peace this side of the grave, as well as salvation beyond.

The Incomparable Gospel

In 1892, an American tourist was talking in Calcutta to a high-class Bengali. During their conversation, this dark-colored native of India exultantly said: "Ah, you are from America. We are soon going to send over our missionaries to Chicago, and we shall convert America to the teachings of Kali, Buddha, and Mohammed." But when the Oriental missionaries began to talk, we remembered the burning ghats of the Ganges. We could hear the death-cries of the child-widows, who were being sacrificed upon the funeral pyres. We could see all the superstitions and debaucheries of the harems, and the degradations of their people in the East. Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia might burn brightly when fed by the oil of the poetic imagination of the gifted English writer, who married a dark-skinned daughter of the East; but Arnold's Light of Asia was found to be as dark as India, with its teeming millions in utter darkness. Darkness black as that of Africa, or as dark as the benighted human beings who, as cannibals, are banqueting off human flesh. As all peoples must believe in a God of some sort, so to-day, as never before, the intelligent, civilized nations, know that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is the only Gospel which will bring true peace and progress to the world. When a native chief asked Queen Victoria the source of England's strength, she handed to him a Bible. So, to-day, most of the civilized races are ready to confess that the strength of the mightiest earthly governments is centered in the Word of God. Where the Bible is not, there are superstition and ignorance, and brutalizing crime.

Thus, many preliminary battles have already been fought and won. Now comes the practical question: What race of people is going to start forth to lead in the last great battle, which is to be fought for the redemption of the world for Christ? Has Jesus a right to look with hope towards any people more confidently than to the Anglo-Saxon race? From what race came the Crusaders, Godfrey and Frederick Barbarossa, and Baldwin of Flanders, and Richard, the Lion-hearted, and Frederick II? From what race came the Pilgrim Fathers, who crossed the seas, imbued with many noble ambitions, the chief of which was to carry the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the furthermost ends of the earth? Among the hearts of what people was the great foreign missionary cause first born? Who to-day are striving most of all to civilize and Christianize the world at large? Is it not the members of the Anglo-Saxon race? Is there any people who can be more justly called a Christian people, than the Anglo-Saxons?

The Anglo-Saxon race is best qualified to lead in this great forward movement for Christ, also, because in this century it holds a position of dominant power and influence among the nations, analogous to that held by ancient Rome at the birth of Christianity. They geographically hold the stragetic points of all the world. Open the map of the world where you will, and drop your finger at random. Gibraltar, the key of the Medierranean, held by England. Suez Canal and the sovereignty of Egypt, by England. Eastern as well as Northern Africa dominated by England. The Islands of the Pacific held by Germany, England, and the United States. North and South America dominated by the United States Government by its "Monroe Doctrine." Europe, for the most part, controlled or influenced by Germany or England. Both supreme in their own ways—England by her navy, Germany by her army. The whale and the lion practically unconquerable in their own domains.

Then, where can you find a people mentally and spiritually and physically better equipped to carry forth this Gospel message, than the members of the Anglo-Saxon race? To conquer the world for Christ, God is going to use giants now, as he used giants of old. "God made the violin," Stradivarius used to say, "but God had to first make an Antonio Stradivarius before he could put together his best violins." Under the power of the Holy Spirit, the apostolic messengers were able to scatter the Gospel messages everywhere. But how could such wonders have been accomplished in so short a time unless God had first sent forth a messenger, mentally and spiritually gigantic, as he did when he sent forth Paul? And where can God get better modern emissaries, if we are willing to do what we ought to do, than among the members of the Anglo-Saxon race?

There are many reasons why the Anglo-Saxon race should lead in this movement. Some of these may be regarded as fanciful and romantic. It is not long since a professor, formerly of Yale University, undertook to prove that the Anglo-Saxon race represents the ten lost tribes of Israel, and he even asserted that the present reigning house of Great Britain is descended from King Solomon, through a Hebrew Princess named Tea Tephi, who became the bride of King Fergus, of Ireland and Scotland, from whom descended King James VI. of Scotland, who became King James I. of England. He contended that the very stone which forms the seat of the Coronation Chair, on which the monarchs of Great Britain sit when they are crowned, originally formed part of Solomon's Temple, and was brought to Ireland by Tea Tephi herself, as a precious relic. With all such fanciful traditions we have nothing to do. The essential fact is, that the Gospel of Christ, which must ultimately triumph, is enshrined in the hearts of the Anglo-Saxon race more than in those of any other race, and that they have the opportunity and the qualities which fit them to embrace it of propagating that Gospel to the ends of the earth.

This glorious consummation of Christ's earthly kingdom, I believe will be achieved under God's omnipotent power, working through the Anglo-Saxon race. Who will lead the way? The beginning of every great movement in the world's history has been humble and inconspicuous. The origin of the Christian Church itself, now numbering its millions in all lands, was in a single room, in which, all told, there were only one hundred and twenty persons. Where will the movement for the final triumph begin? It may be in such a church as this, but it will be somewhere, where there is a band of earnest, consecrated, praying souls—men and women self-sacrificing, ardent, agonizing in supplication to God for power. There is an old proverb which goes something like this: "The best way for a city to keep its streets clean, is for every man to clean the sidewalk in front of his own home." The best way for the Anglo-Saxon race to start on this world-wide mission, is for us, as individuals, to start here, and start now. A little handful, under the power of the Holy Spirit, we may accomplish at least as much for Christ as did that little band of praying men and women in the upper chamber of Jerusalem?

So, to-day, I want to enlarge your Gospel horizon. I want to show that the work you can do for Jesus, should be studied no longer through a microscope, but through a telescope. I want to show you that, as all time is merely nothing more than a long succession of seconds and minutes, and days, and weeks, and years, so all great events are merely the accumulations of the works of single individuals. The Anglo-Saxon in great units may be composed of nations. The Anglo-Saxon race in small units, is composed of individuals just like ourselves. Will you and I start here and now, with God's help, for the conquest of the world for Christ? Will you and I, here and now consecrate our lives to his service, so that we may become his acceptable messengers for this work?

The final redemption of the world would not be far off, if we could only bring Jesus in touch with all mankind. An imaginative religious writer once had this beautiful dream about how the world was finally to be conquered for Jesus. It was, I believe, to be in the year 2001. A great international war was about to burst over Europe. All the nations of the continent were divided into two sides. England, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Belgium and Holland were on the one side. France, Spain, Italy, Turkey, Austria and Russia were upon the other side. The great armies were marshaled into two mighty hosts, the tread of whose feet and the rumble of whose cannon made the earth shake. The night before the decisive battle was to open, the camp-fires of the sleeping soldiers stretched for miles and miles away. But the night before that battle opened, a strange being was seen to go rapidly through the different camps of the nations. Upon the breast of each soldier he pinned a badge or a sign. The next morning the bugles sounded, and the armies were drawn up in battle array. But when the generals gave the command, "Fire," and "Charge," not one gun spoke, not one soldier moved. Then the generals began to inquire the cause. They found out the reason. The strange being, who the night before went from camp to camp, was Jesus Christ. The badge which was pinned upon every soldier's breast was the Sign of the Cross. Jesus had at last conquered. The sign of forgiveness, and of love, and pardon, and sinlessness had at last spiked the guns of war, and turned every soldier into an emissary of peace. There is only one way I would change that wonderful dream of the Gospel writer. In the last great battle of sinful war, I would not have the members of the Anglo-Saxon race participants. The night before the battle was to open, I would have Jesus Christ go through the camp of the Slav, the Malay, and all the peoples of the earth, led by a white-skinned guide. That guide I would have the ruddy, flaxen-haired Caucasian, the guide whom I would call the Anglo-Saxon race. Oh my brother, and sister, by the consecration of your lives, and prayers, will you not help make this scene possible? Will you not here and now start forth, by God's help, to conquer in the near future, the world for Jesus Christ?

MARVELS OF GRACE IN A TWO YEARS' CAMPAIGN

By JOHN WILLIS BAER

FOR the past two years the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee has successfully stimulated the churches to an aggressive work, and is now able to make a most interesting and inspiring report to the General Assembly, about to meet in Los Angeles, California. It was at the Philadelphia Assembly two years ago that the Presbyterian Church determined to begin an aggressive campaign for souls. To direct the work, a committee was appointed, Mr. John H. Converse, the leading layman of the Presbyterian Church, serving in the capacity of Chairman. In his business, Mr. Converse has oversight of fourteen thousand employees, and has not had a strike to contend with in over forty years. Not only has he given time, but he has contributed largely of his money, and with a few other friends has made it possible for the Evangelistic Committee to do an extensive work without calling upon the church treasury. The present committee is made up of an equal number of pastors and elders, among them the following:

DICK GRAY

Last year the work and plans became so engrossing and important, that Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was urged to devote his whole time to it. After consultation with his own church, the officers reluctantly gave him up to the Presbyterian Church at large. Great streams of literature have gone out, and a vast correspondence has been conducted during the last twelve months, and the whole church has felt the influence of this magnificent work performed by the Committee.

One of its duties has been to suggest to ministers methods for evangelistic work. A large clerical force has been engaged on this extensive correspondence, and thousands and thousands of pieces of literature and leaflets have been sent out, most of it gratuitously. Conferences have been held in most of the theological seminaries, and members of the Committee have visited the larger cities. They have met ministers and teachers and workers in all-day Conferences, generally closing the Conference with a popular meeting in the evening.

A most important and far-reaching work has been that inaugurated by the "Young Men's Presbyterian Union" of Chicago, where nearly three hundred young men have pledged themselves to definite, individual work for individuals.

The committee has striven to emphasize the need of "individual work by individuals for individuals." These appeals have been made to the more than seven thousand ministers, the nearly twenty-nine thousand elders, the more than ten thousand deacons, in the Presbyterian Church, and to the more than one hundred thousand Sunday School superintendents and teachers and workers. It is difficult to appreciate the lasting good to be accomplished when this great body is on fire with the spirit of God.

Some of the work accomplished by evangelists representing the committee is distinctly notable. Rev. F. E. Higgins and his work in the lumber camps of Minnesota belong to this class. Mr. Higgins traveled over the snows of last winter in a sled drawn by a pair of great Saint Bernard dogs, and the religion of Christ was expounded in many a homesteader's cabin, up to within a hundred miles of the international boundary. Mr. Higgins has been called the "Logging Camp Presbyterian Missionary of Minnesota." Large in frame, weighing over 200 pounds, this great hearted man, with his splendid team of dogs, has at times traveled forty miles in six and a half hours. When there was a crust on the snow, he paid no attention to roads. Sometimes he was caught out at night, and was obliged to camp out in the woods. In his sled he carried a small tent, and, aiming to reach a town by nightfall, he would pitch his tent, cut boughs and fix a bed on the snow, and, with a dog on each side, sleep comfortably, conscious of security. In many places, he was the first preacher to find his way to the logging camps. During March he held twenty meetings, traveled two hundred and sixty-three miles by sled, in addition to nearly five hundred miles on the train, not only reaching the logging camps, but also the homesteaders, who were destitute of religious influences. Mr. Higgins' work is a great blessing to a large company of people in an extensive territory.

F. E. HIGGINS AND HIS ST. BERNARD TEAM

At Van Wert, Ohio, special meetings were held, and one day all the stores and saloons were closed for two hours. The Presbyterian Church there on March 29th received seventy-seven on confession of faith, thirty-seven of whom received baptism. An evangelist in a small town in Minnesota tells about several remarkable conversions, one of a postmaster over fifty, a hard drinker for more than fifteen years; another, of a man of forty-eight, who had been addicted to drink since he was a boy, and who came into the church with his son. One of the leading and wealthiest merchants of the town, with his wife, his two sons and his sister-in-law, were admitted to the church. The man promised, before the whole congregation, that he would henceforth keep his store closed on Sunday. From Colby, Kan., comes word that fifty made decision for Christ, and twenty-five will come into the Presbyterian Church.

A remarkable illustration of what God can do through one consecrated person, is given in the experience of a school teacher of Indianola, Ia. Union meetings were being conducted by Mr. A. M. Naylor, reaching a number of unconverted people. The school-teacher confessed to had been a Christian for years, but had never taken a vital interest in personal work. In these meetings God laid upon her the burden of souls, and in four weeks she had led more than one hundred and fifty to accept Christ, eighty-five per cent. of them being young college students!

Major Cole has labored under the Committee with marked blessing. At Lima, Ohio, meetings continue under his direction with increasing interest. A canvass was made of the entire city, divided into wards, each ward being placed in charge of a captain and such workers as were willing to visit homes and distribute invitations. Nearly three hundred Christians were engaged in this canvass, and over six hundred cards were handed in, with the names, addresses, and church preferences of families to be visited by pastors and others, following up the work. Necessary services of song with evangelistic preaching were held in various shops with good results.

A Notable Anniversary

IT was eminently fitting that the first national celebration, in connection with the World's Fair Dedication, should have been that of the Louisiana Purchase, which was patriotically observed on April 30, and the two succeeding days, in the Exhibition City. That purchase, which gave to our country the vast territory now occupied by practically all the States bordering on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, was an event whose importance can never be lost sight of by posterity.

When Napoleon signed away France's American possessions for $15,000,000, our territory, which hitherto had been bounded on the west by the eastern bank of the Mississippi, was at once extended to include what afterwards became the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, part of Colorado, and Wyoming, Montana, the two Dakotas, Minnesota, Iowa and Oklahoma and Indian Territory—the tract which now comprises the central section of the Union, and which includes some of the finest and most prosperous States under the starry flag. At the outset of the negotiations, it was proposed to purchase only that part of the province of Louisiana which included the city of New Orleans; but the French Emperor, whose schemes of European conquest were then expanding to colossal proportions, himself proposed that the negotiation should include all the territory owned by France in the central part of the Western Continent—nearly a million square miles—very little of which had been explored by the whites. This new turn to the negotiations opened up vast possibilities, of which our statesmen were not slow to take advantage, and thus the rich possessions, of which France had once dreamed that she might make a second Canada, passed into our control. Napoleon foresaw the difficulties that would arise in attempting to hold so extensive a territory against the intrepid and progressive young American colonies; but he could not have foreseen the mighty development that was destined to take place along the great Mississippi highway.

When this magnificent territory was added to the Union it was but little known. The upper Missouri had been visited by a few daring travelers, but the country was wild and filled with hostile Indians. St. Louis was a mere French trading-settlement, and beyond it, all was wilderness. Two years after the treaty, a strong expedition visited the upper Missouri River, and returned with glowing reports of the character of the country. What was then a wilderness, nominally Catholic but largely heathen, has since become a cluster of Christian States, a great grain-growing section of the Union. Populous cities and thriving towns and villages have sprung up on every hand; railroads bridge every stream and chasm, and tunnel the mountains; river transportation lines have opened up the country to commerce along the waterways; the great fertile areas supply enough cereals to feed the nation many times over, while a thousand varied industries swell the tide of commerce that flows through what a century ago was almost an unknown land.

It is impossible to overestimate the influence of this act of territorial expansion upon the fortunes of the nation. It established at once our supremacy in the Western world. Eminent writers have contended that the Louisiana Purchase afforded the momentum which ultimately resulted in removing from our immediate borders other foreign nationalities, and thus gave rise to the principle which eventually crystallized in the Monroe Doctrine. Professor Turner asserts that that doctrine would not have been possible except for the Purchase, of which it was the logical outcome; and that the event itself "dates the rise of the United States into the position of a world power."

Like almost all our other acquisitions, the Louisiana Purchase was a conquest of peace. Recognizing this fact, the French people, who entertain a warm friendship for this nation, are to be represented on a larger scale in the Exposition than any other country on the continent of Europe. There are no regrets, no recriminations, no aftermath of bitterness over France's lost possessions. The Republic of the East can cordially unite with the Republic of the West in the celebration of an event which afforded satisfaction to both peoples, and which gave to our own land a territory in which every American feels a glow of patriotic pride.

Making Allowance

WHEN a certain lymphatic member, who took things always easily, said to his nervous, excitable pastor, who was speaking somewhat testily, "Dominie, restrain your temper," he was met with the perfectly true reply, "Restrain my temper, sir! I would have you to understand that I restrain more temper in the course of a single day than you do in a year."

That was a difference of temperament, but the same thing holds in occupations and surroundings; and while we ought never to excuse ourselves for our shortcomings by pleading our circumstances, yet we ought to be ready in all Christian charity to make allowance for others, for whom on any account it is peculiarly hard to maintain the highest style of Christian character.

The flower in the window of a poor woman's garret in the close and dingy street may be far from a perfect specimen of its kind, but the wonder is that it is there at all—a greater wonder, surely, than to find a splendid representative of the same species in the rich man's conservatory.

And so there may be more honor to one for what of true religion he has maintained in the face of great obstacles, though it be marred by blemishes, than there is to another in whom no such imperfections appear, but who has had no such difficulties.

And for ourselves, though we dare not seek an excuse in our outward conditions, or in our temperaments for our weaknesses and failures in Christian living, yet it is a precious comfort to remember that the Lord knows all, and that He sees

> With other, larger eyes than ours,
> To make allowance for us all.

Grateful Words From Finland

FROM the plain people of Finland, from the peasants in the interior provinces, and from the farmers and farm-laborers in remote districts, letters are now coming almost daily, which reveal how deeply America's kindness, in the time of sore trial and suffering, has touched the native heart.

Many of these letters are sent to us by relatives in this country, who have received them from their kindred in "the old land." Prof. J. H. Jasberg, of Suomi College, Hancock, Mich., writes us as follows:

I have received many, many letters lately, from people to whom we sent smaller sums of money, and others to whom we sent larger sums, and especially from those in authority, where we sent money to smaller places where there are only a few families, the letters stating that they had absolutely nothing until they got the money from here, and how they had purchased flour, potatoes, and other things, and how thankful they were that God had moved the hearts of the people "of the other side of the water," and persuaded them to help them.

Your paper and its readers have done lots of good work during this past winter, helping our poor unfortunate people, and we all hope that your time and efforts in their behalf will sometime be repaid—if not in this world, then certainly in the hereafter. We know that such good work will always bring good results.

Without your starting the work early this year, among the American people, thousands of people in poor Finland would be in their graves, who are now alive. You were the people who started the movement among the whole Christian people in America, and enlisted their sympathies for the Finnish-Swedish famine-sufferers.

Of course, thousands upon thousands of dollars went to the old country in other ways than through your hands, but we will always give you credit for the beginning of the good work, and that you did more than all the others combined.

Another letter, from Finland, tells how the gratitude of the people is echoed in the journals throughout the entire country. The writer says:

The Finnish press is united in conceding that the aid that came from America has saved thousands of Finnish peasants from the torture unto death that comes of starvation.

From Sweden, too, we have received similar letters, all conveying the warmest messages of thanks and invoking rich blessings upon those who, by their liberal gifts, made the relief campaign a possibility. Swedish residents in America have also written us, from full hearts, telling their gratitude for what has been done, in the name of Christ, in behalf of the dear ones who were fighting the famine at home.

These communications are direct heart-to-heart messages to every one who has had a share, however small, in this benevolent work. It is a sweet and sacred thing to know that in a multitude of humble Swedish homes and by the firesides in thousands of Finnish cabins, the good people of America, who fed the famishing and brought back life and hope to those who were ready to perish, are lovingly remembered. It is surely a great thing to have the love of a nation; but it is even more beautiful when, as these letters tell us, the earnest prayers of the people ascend daily, that the Divine blessing may rest upon those who reached out hands full of help across the icy seas and the frozen wastes of the Northland, in the midwinter famine.

The sense of duty done was of itself a sufficient reward; but He who permits no good deed to pass unnoted has added, in this rich outpouring of love and gratitude, a recognition beyond all anticipation.

MARVELS OF GRACE

Another Presbyterian evangelist has been working in a town where there was a saloon for each twenty-nine people. One of the saloon-keepers was induced to give up his business.

Still another conspicuous work of grace was experienced in Norton, Kan. Services were conducted by Rev. E. R. Hermiston, and all denominations united in the Union movement. The mayor of the town was converted, and meetings were held in the court-house and opera-house. Many leading business men were led to Christ, and the influence of the meetings broke up the gambling dens. Mr. A. H. Gray, commonly known as "Dick, the gambler," gave his heart to Christ. Dick has a reputation in Deadwood, Red Cloud, and other western towns as "Big-hearted Dick, the gentleman gambler." He is forty years old, weighs two hundred and thirty pounds, is six feet tall and an all 'round athlete. The story of his conversion reads like a romance. One of the local pastors of Norton reports Dick Gray as saying, the night he was converted, "Boys, the stuff's off; cash in; leave here; no more cards; never come back; quit! That's what I mean." And when he turned to the audience in the meeting where he acknowledged Christ, he said, "I have thought it over carefully, and have once for all made up my mind." From that meeting he went to his gambling den, closed it, went home and kissed his wife and had family prayers. On the night he gave his heart to Christ, forty-six other men surrendered, and that same day twenty-seven others signed cards to live a Christian life. While the pastors of Norton are laboring hard, Dick Gray goes from house to house seeking lost souls. It was claimed that Dick Gray had been getting over twelve thousand dollars a year from his dens of iniquity, and Norton is not a large town. Now this man has turned his back upon all this, and is doing personal work for Christ.

In these and many other ways, through the Evangelistic Committee of the Presbyterian Church, the Gospel is being carried to thousands in church and out. While the Committee is putting especial emphasis upon the work done through existing organizations, and is stirring the Church to aggressive work, it is also going out through its representatives into the by-ways and hedges, compelling those who do not know Christ to come and bow the knee to the King of kings and Lord of lords.

Russian Diplomacy

RECENT dispatches from St. Petersburg indicate an intention on the part of the Czar's government, to disavow the policy, described in these columns last week, as to Manchuria. It is now stated that the seven demands, specifically quoted as having been made on China as a condition of withdrawal from the province, were never made. This is not the first time in modern history that Russia has taken a similar course. By putting forth a programme without definite authority, the opinion of other Powers has been elicited and an indication of their attitude obtained. When that result has been attained, it is open for Russia to proceed to execute the programme if that course appears safe, or to disavow the programme altogether if its execution seems likely to be attended with disagreeable consequences. In this instance the latter course has been taken, and there is good reason for believing that the resolute stand taken by Mr. Hay on behalf of our Government has contributed to the result. The possibility of war on the subject was probably never feared by Russia, and Mr. Hay's courteous treatment of the Russian Ambassador, Count Cassini, had doubtless nothing of menace in it, but it must have been quite clear to the Russian Government that if it persisted in the programme outlined, our Government would regard the act as a distinct violation of definite pledges, and would in future relations regard Russian engagements with distrust. The fact that England and Japan would take the same view must have been foreseen; but it is doubtful whether so much importance would be attached to the attitude of those Powers, whom Russia regards as constitutionally unfriendly, as to the position of our Government, which has always been on good terms with it. There is still some doubt as to the course Russia will take as to relinquishing her hold on Manchuria, but it is gratifying to learn that so odious an arrangement as that described is disavowed. The province is not only an important part of the Chinese Empire, but it has a sentimental value for the ruling powers, because it is the original home of the dynasty, and in it are the tombs of the Emperor's ancestors. It would, therefore, be very humiliating to have it alienated in fact, if not nominally, from the Empire. That China would have to yield to Russia if no other Power went to her help, was inevitable; but she would feel about it as did the ancient landowner, whose king demanded the possession of his ancestral property:

> The Lord forbid that I should give the inheritance of my fathers to thee (II. Kings 21: 3).

Collapse of a Mountain

Mystery surrounds the disaster which completely destroyed the mining town of Frank, in British Columbia, on April 29. It was a town of about one thousand inhabitants, situated at the foot of Turtle Mountain. The width of the valley is about a mile, and a wall of rock more than three thousand feet high rose above the town. A valuable coal mine was being worked there, from which twelve hundred tons of coal a day were being taken. Between four and five o'clock on the morning of the disaster, a loud report was heard, and instantly millions of tons of rock fell from the mountain into the valley. It is difficult to understand how any one escaped being crushed. Every house on which the rocks fell, was destroyed, and the valley was filled with the debris. People sleeping in their beds were instantly killed, and all the men around the entrance to the mine lost their lives. Those at work in the mine escaped unhurt. In some places where, on the day before, there was a home full of happy children, there is now only a heap of stones nearly two hundred feet high. How many perished has not, at the time of writing, been definitely ascertained, but it is known that at least fifty-six are missing. All the machinery and operating plant outside of the mine was destroyed, involving a loss estimated at two million dollars. The appearance of the mountain has completely changed. One side of it is broken away, and along its face is a fissure several feet wide, and nearly a mile long. The cause of the catastrophe is, as yet, a mystery. Some attribute it to volcanic force, others to an earthquake, and others, again, to an explosion of gas. It is impossible to investigate, as the mighty force, which rent the mountain, loosened huge boulders, which continue falling at intervals. Arrangements are being made to ascertain the extent of the disaster as soon as it is safe. A calamity so sudden and appalling shocks the whole community, and arouses profound sympathy with the sufferers. It should not, however, end there, for there are none who can be certain that their end may be less sudden, and none who can afford to postpone to a death bed, preparation for meeting God.

> When they are saying, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them (1. Thess. 5: 3).

A Bank's Precaution

One of the banks in a town in New England in which there is an epidemic of smallpox, has decided to make an entirely new issue of one and two dollar notes, to lessen the danger of contagion. The bank officers say that the money is probably as dangerous to the community, from a sanitary point of view, as any other means of contagion. The small notes in circulation for a year or two have become very worn and soiled, and give evidence of hard usage. The money is passed from smallpox quarantined blocks for purchase of supplies, notwithstanding the danger of spreading the disease. The bank officers also say that the danger is increased by wetting the finger with the tongue when counting the money. Efforts will be made to get the other banks to furnish new money to prevent danger of contagion. It is a wise precaution, for the desire for money is so intense, that not even the fear of contracting disease would keep people from taking the money if it was offered to them. There are many, indeed, who run still worse risks in their efforts to obtain it.

> The love of money is the root of all evil, which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith and pierced themselves through with many sorrows (I. Timothy 6: 10).

A Novel Test of Death

In the course of a report of a funeral in Jersey City, N. J., in a local journal, record is made of a peculiar test of death. The deceased was a woman of sixty years of age. She had been in the employ of a firm of cigar-makers, and had been for many years a member of the Cigar-makers' Union. She had been admitted in the early days of the Union, and was accustomed to boast that she was the only woman member the Union ever had. That she fully appreciated her unique honor was evident from her enthusiastic friendship with other members and her regular participation with them in the business of the Union. At her funeral, the whole lodge attended. Her executor made a speech, in which he said that he had visited the deceased during her illness, and had received from her special instructions, which he had pledged himself, in spite of his reluctance, to carry out. The deceased had laid aside a hundred dollars out of her savings, which she wished expended in treating the members of the Union to drink at her funeral. She also desired that a glass of kummel, which was her favorite drink, should be offered to her as she lay in her coffin. In making this request, she laughingly said: "If I do not drink it, you may be quite sure that I am dead." In fulfilment of his promise, he poured out the drink and offered it to the dead woman. The fact that she could not drink it did not prevent the others indulging, though it might have served as a warning that the time would come to each, when their happiness would depend on something far different from the gratification of the appetites.

> The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink but righteousness and peace (Rom. 14: 17).

How a Legacy was Lost

The will of a retired merchant in New York which was presented for probate last week, contains a singular paragraph in reference to the former business partner of the deceased. The two men were close friends, and had been in business together for nearly forty years. The dead man, however, had carried to the grave a grudge against his partner, of whom he said in his will: "As my former partner, after the death of my wife, has not shown to the world around him that he felt with me a kind of natural sympathy in my bereavement, nor even spent seventy-five cents for a crape around his hat, therefore, he shall be excluded from any benefit of my testament." Every relative and friend the deceased had, seems to have been remembered in the will by a legacy large or small, so that the omission of his partner's name among the legatees is the more notable. Happily, the surviving partner, though feeling hurt by the remark in his associate's will, can afford to do without the legacy. He did not know that his failure to identify himself with his partner in mourning, would be so resented. We may hope no worse loss may befall him through such neglect. There are some who will suffer infinite loss because they do not identify themselves with Christ, and show loyalty to him before men.

> Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his glory (Luke 9: 26).

OUT OF THE VALLEY OF DECISION ❋ Paul Before Agrippa

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 24 ACTS 26: 19-29; | By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts | GOLDEN TEXT — "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day" ACTS 26: 22

FELIX, the governor, speaks: "At the time I was summoned to Rome that I might yield my office to a successor, Paul had been my prisoner for two years. At his first appearance before me, I had set his case aside, pending the coming of the chief captain, Claudius Lysias, for which there never seemed to be a convenient season. All possible liberty I accorded to Paul. He was placed in custody of a soldier, not chained, and his friends were freely admitted to him. From time to time I sent for him, in the hope that he might offer a price for his liberty. These occasions were not altogether agreeable, as Paul used the opportunity to preach to me. It was a question when I was about to go out of office, whether or not I should release Paul, which it was my privilege to do, for I was fully convinced that he was not guilty of any wrong doing. But I must frankly confess that I thought leaving him in bonds might soften the asperity of the Jews toward me, and save me from their accusations in the tribunal at Rome."

The soldiers speak: "We could not understand why so good a man should be put in prison. He was unlike any other prisoner we had ever seen. He spent his time in reading a book which he said was the Word of God. And we often heard him talking to his God. A certain friend whom he called Luke came oftener to see him than any other. He seemed to be a physician, for he sometimes told Paul what he must do to preserve his health. At other times he would write down things which Paul told him about a person whom they called the Lord Jesus Christ. When any one of us soldiers was alone with this prisoner, he talked to us about his God."

Illustration and Application

In this lesson we see two men in the Valley of Decision, stirred by God's call. Both entered it enemies of Christ. Agrippa was a Herod, but that name was hardly more terrible to Christians in the early church than the name of Saul of Tarsus, their fiercest persecutor. Saul heard God's call and went out of the twilight Valley of Decision by the morning gate of Obedience. Agrippa, sore in conscience as God spoke to him through the apostle, went sneering out of the midnight gate of Disobedience. These are the only gates. Which will you take?

I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. When Christ, out of the opened heavens, called Paul to a Christian life and to missionary work, it meant to give up his living as a Sanhedrin judge and chief inquisitor, to be himself persecuted and poor. But he followed the divine ideal gladly, despite the seeming sacrifice. Like fidelity to duty was seen in many a Scotch pastor when State support was conscientiously given up by those who formed the "Free Church." Two of them were speaking together of the number of their children, whose support would be endangered by this step. One of them said, "We shall be as poor as any wanderers on nature's common, but I had a letter from my wife this morning and she exhorts me to stand true, saying, 'Give up all for Christ and your peace shall flow like a river.'"

On his way home from Siberia, the late Baron Nordenskjold received a telegram from the Russian Government, asking him if he would accept a decoration from the Czar, in recognition of his services to the country. Now the baron was a member of the anti-decoration society, which pledged its supporters to receive no decorations from anybody; and he wrestled long with himself before he finally yielded to the temptation, and telegraphed back that he would gladly accept the honor. How great then was his chagrin when, on reaching home, a friend told him that the Czar was fully aware of his antipathy to honors of the nature of decorations, and had put aside the sum of three hundred thousand roubles, to be given to him in case of his refusal of the offer. "Russia," added the friend, blandly, "is certainly grateful to you for your failure to live up to your pledge!" A man does not lose three hundred thousand roubles every time he breaks a pledge, but the moral is good for all—be true to your ideals.

Vacation Opportunities

Showed first unto them of Damascus . . . that they should repent. The newly-converted Saul was but a temporary visitor in Damascus, where he was converted and called to foreign missionary work, but he began right where he was to testify of Christ—a good example to theological students, to missionary volunteers, to the many who go from city homes to summer residences—where the temptation is strong to excuse one's self from active service because church membership is elsewhere. Often a prayer-filled song may prove an arrow of conviction. A brilliant young lawyer, commonly absorbed in the effort to rise to distinction and financial success in his profession, used to think in solemn moments: What is the use of all this and what the end? But it was only a passing thought until sickness shut him into his home. One Lord's Day evening, he was lying by his window thinking of his Christian mother's teachings, feeling he had studied his law books more than his Bible, and wishing he knew more about God. Just then from a hall on the floor below, where Gospel meetings were held, he heard the hymn:

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that Thou bidst me come to Thee.

A little later, from a church next door, came the same hymn. "It is God's voice," he said; and on his knees exclaimed:

Oh, Lamb of God, I come, I come!

He sent for the preacher the next evening, who told him he had been moved to change his subject and his hymns. "It is God's hand," said the lawyer; and he took that hand for guidance through life. Let us make our songs calls to repentance wherever we are, but not our songs alone. One of the writer's pleasantest memories, worth repeating here if told before, is of a May day in Central Park, New York, when he sat beside a young man while May parties merrily gathered on every side, and successfully invited him to the gladness of a Christian life. Felix, postponing his decision to a more convenient season, is but little worse than the Christian who is ever postponing the duty and privilege of inviting others to Christ to a more convenient place.

Works meet for repentance. At this springtime, there are thousands who have but recently begun a Christian life. Let them not forget that repentance is first a "change of mind," and then a change of life. It is not enough to do this and that. Talks of morality are too negative. Let us not talk of disease so much, but cultivate unconscious health. There is more sin in not doing, than in doing. When Christ pictured the judgment the sufficient ground of awful punishment, was "Ye did it not" (Matt. 25). We are not to wait for great or exceptional opportunities, nor to think that religion has only to do with Sundays and hours of devotion. Robert Louis Stevenson nobly said: "The task before us, which is to coendure with our existence, is one of microscopic fineness, and the heroism required is that of patience. There is no cutting of the Gordian knots of life. Earth must be smilingly unraveled. To be honest, to be kind, to earn a little and spend a little less, to make a family happier for his presence, to renounce, when that may be necessary, and not to be embittered; to keep a few friends, but these without capitulation; above all, on the same given condition to keep friends with himself—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy."

Witnessing both to small and great. We are more willing to witness to average people than to either small or great. It is a shame that one who speaks for the King of kings should be abashed in the presence of any titled sinner. Paul preached to them with no trembling. It was they who did the trembling. One of the most faithful officers of Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, was General Ziethen, a fearless Christian. One Good Friday the king invited him to dine with him. The invitation was declined, on the ground that he was called that day to the "Supper" of a higher King. Shortly after, another invitation to dine came from the king, and was accepted. During the conversation, the sceptical king turned to Ziethen and made some flippant, almost blasphemous joke about the Lord's Supper, in favor of which the general had excused himself from the king's dinner. The company laughed, but Ziethen rose, and said:

"Your majesty knows that in war I have never feared any danger, and that, whenever it was required, I have resolutely risked my life for you and for the country. This feeling still animates me, and if it is of any use, and you command it, I will willingly lay my head at your feet. But there is One above us, who is more than you and me—more than all men—the Saviour and Redeemer of the world. That Saviour I cannot allow to be ridiculed, for on him rests my faith, my trust, and my hope in life and in death. In the strength of this faith your brave army has courageously fought and conquered; if your majesty undermine it, you undermine at the same time the welfare of the state. This is a true saying indeed. May it please your majesty to excuse my freedom."

A King's Confession

The astonished guests listened in silence. The king, deeply moved, offered to the general his right hand, laid the left on his shoulder, and exclaimed in faltering tones: "Happy Ziethen! I wish I could believe like you. Hold fast your faith. It shall be done no more."

Many of us have been less faithful in protest when those less "great" have assailed our Master. Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost says he once ventured to speak to a very great man on religious matters, and asked him if he were a Christian; but he did so with some trepidation, not knowing how the man would receive it. At the close of the talk that ensued, the doctor expressed the hope that the man had not considered him impertinent. The answer was a warm grasp of the hand, and the following impressive words: "Don't ever hesitate to speak to any man about his soul. I have been longing for twenty years to have some Christian speak to me. I believe there are thousands of men in this city who are in the same condition that I am, carrying an uneasy conscience and a great burden on their souls; not courageous enough to seek instruction, yet willing to receive it." But we are almost as much given to neglecting our opportunities to witness to the "small," the lowly, and the young—the Chinaman, the servant, and the street boy. Here it is pertinent to recall again the great fruitage that came from Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., preaching on a stormy Sunday, when the audience was but one, and that a little girl. She entered that day into Christian life so earnestly that nearly fourscore were brought by her into the church.

Festus said, Paul, thou art beside thyself. That Paul should preach Christ instead of pleading for his own release, seemed to the selfish Festus to be madness. A Roman emperor used almost the same words in a like case. Basil, an eminent man in the church shortly after New Testament times, was brought before a pagan prætor, who sought to induce him to give up his Christian faith. Dignities and riches were offered him from the emperor. "These," he replied, "are fit to catch children. We are ready to suffer a thousand deaths rather than offend Christ." "Know ye not who we are that command you to recant?" "We submit to no one when they command such things." The prætor threatened confiscation, torment, banishment, death. "As for confiscation," said Basil, "I have nothing to lose. As for banishment, heaven only is my country. As for torment, this body will soon give way. As for death, that will only set me at liberty." "Thou art mad," said the prætor, to which Basil replied: "I wish I may be ever so." His courage impressed all present, even the prætor, and the emperor, instead of persisting in persecution, offered Basil a present, which he refused. It is the sinner who is insane. The repentant one "comes to himself" from the "far country" of folly.

I know that thou believest. Here indeed is madness, that Agrippa believes the prophets intellectually, but acts like an infidel. "Ye knew your duty and ye did it not"—that is indeed the supreme sin. His reply, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," may have been partly a sneer, but when we put it with Paul's assurance that Agrippa believed the prophets, it is almost certain his conscience, like that of Felix, was aroused; but like Felix and unlike Paul, he was disobedient to the heavenly vision. Paul's reply is one of supreme courtesy and unselfishness. He wishes that his judges and accusers were in like condition to himself, except the chains—as glad of heart in the sense of sins forgiven. Paul never showed bitterness toward those who persecuted him, his deepest yearning being to "clasp hands over the bloody chasm." Those who have quarreled, mostly because they have misunderstood each other, in Church and State and personal life, may well catch the spirit of Kipling's recent poem on the reconciliation of British and Boer, and give it wider meaning:

Here where my fresh-turned furrows run and the deep soil glistens red,
I will repair the wrong that was done to the living and the dead:
Here where the senseless bullet fell, and the barren shrapnel burst,
I will plant a tree, I will dig a well, against the heat and the thirst.

Here in a large and sunlit land, where no wrong bites to the bone,
I will lay my hand in my neighbor's hand, and together we will atone
For the set folly and the red breach and the black waste of it all;
Giving and taking counsel each over the cattle-kraal.

HASTE TO THE WEDDING!

IN the spring," says Tennyson, "a young man's fancies lightly turn to thoughts of love." Whatever else happens in this queer old world of ours, thank God, love never goes out of fashion! Many a youthful heart is beating faster in these bright days, because the pulse keeps time to the music of "haste to the wedding." For weeks, the bride-to-be has been busy over her trousseau, the rich, black fruit-cake, made by a provident mother weeks ago, has been growing spicier and sweeter in the dark closet where it is safely hidden from view, and the father of the family, on his part, has been dutifully giving wife and daughter all the money he can spare, that the pride of the house may be upheld, and his child go to her husband in a manner befitting her station. A wedding may be simple or elaborate, according to the means and wishes of the family, and be in perfect taste either way. The wealthy parent may expend, for example, a large sum on the mere decoration of house or church, paying florists for their wares and work. The poorer man, if his bonny daughter be married in May or June, may equally have the ornamentation of flowers; both forest and field will give them for the asking, and loving hands of friends and kindred will put them up in sheaves and sacks and wreathes and garlands. A bride is as beautiful in her wedding gown of white, if it be of simple muslin or organdie, as if it be composed of satin, silk, crepe or other costly fabric, covered with priceless lace. The simple refreshment of sandwiches, cake and ice cream after the ceremony, is as appropriate as the breakfast or supper of many nurses. Around the bride, let there be an atmosphere of joy, of unmixed gladness, of the tenderest love. This is incompatible with a great strain beforehand, with going far beyond one's means, and with striving for effect and show, instead of doing what may be done with ease and honor.

The bridal procession may include flower-girls, pages, maids of honor, bridesmaids, a matron of honor, and a great deal of pomp. But quite as impressive is the simpler form, where the bride enters on her father's arm and meets the bridegroom at the altar; or the still older fashion, in which the intending husband and wife enter together. The bride is traditionally supposed to walk with eyes modestly downcast, on her way to the fateful ceremony; she ought, however, on her return in the new dignity of wifehood, to walk with uplifted head and smiling face, while the bridegroom should be radiant.

Wedding presents may be sent at any time during the fortnight before the function, and they should be acknowledged by the bride in a single personal note. Wedding silver given to the bride may be marked according to her preference, with her maiden initials or with her new name.

A bride's provision for housekeeping includes bed and table linen, and whatever else her parents may see fit to bestow upon her. The bride's family bear every expense of the occasion, except the clergyman's fee and the carriage for going away after the wedding.

Red-Letter Days

The red-letter days of life should be kept in loving remembrance. The day when one consciously began the Christian life is a red-letter day, a day of great and wonderful joy, and should be a sacred anniversary in thought. The day when the first-born came to the home, bringing to father and mother such gladness as they had never dreamed of, is another time of thanksgiving. When some honor is bestowed on a son or daughter; when prosperity sweeps in like a flood and adversity ebbs; when a dear one recovers from disease or a threatened danger is averted, then is the time to lift up a song of praise. But the praise should not cease with the occasion. The psalmist was right when he said, "I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High." Do not let us forget our happy red-letter days.

Fault-finders

"I'd rather she had that man than I," said the cook below stairs to the kitchen-maid washing the dishes.

"Thrue for ye, Bridget," replied little Norah, with a toss of her curly head.

Both women knew their employer for that most distressing of men, a chronic fault-finder. Their sweet voiced and patient mistress was their idol, and they were angry on her account when her husband found the toast invariably too crisp, or too soft, or too something else, the steak tough, or the potatoes watery, or set her nerves on edge by crossness to the children. Heaven help the woman who is married to a fault-finder. She will never find rest except in her grave.

Doing One's Own Work

Thousands and tens of thousands among American women do their own housework with intelligence, orderly routine, and economy, and are therefore not concerned in the perpetually increasing disturbance over the servant-question. Their coal is not wasted; their ranges are not worn out by a heat that melts iron, their kitchens are clean and neat, and, best result of all, their sons and daughters learn to bear a hand and help in whatever homely work is going on. These independent housekeepers serve good food on their tables, and if they are wise, they avail themselves of every modern labor-saving contrivance and invention that makes the work less onerous; they learn to save needless steps, and they are not subject to the whims and caprices of Irish, Swedish, German, French, Norwegian, English, Japanese or Chinese miscalled help. And when they decide to keep servants, they know how to train them.

THE NEW CHOIR

WELL, mother, if you'd been to church
You'd heard the choir sing;
I tell you they are wonderful.
They made the old roof ring.
The new soprano screeched and screamed
In silver notes, they said;
The tenor lifted up his voice
Enough to wake the dead.

The alto, Deacon Blauvelt's Jane,
Sang like a house afire,
The bass, our Sammy, if you please,
Was like our old town crier.
So deep and rumbling were his notes,
Like surf that beats the shore;
I tell you, mother, Sammy's part
Just shook the very floor.

The preacher looked a little vext,
They stole his thunder so,
And when he hurled his little text
On us who sat below,
I knew he wished the singer folks
Had taken up less time;
It hurried him and rattled him,
About his theme sublime.

I like the good old-fashioned way
We had when we were young;
We, who to-day have heads so gray,
Cracked voice and stammering tongue.
But, oh! the tunes we used to sing,
They soared a wee bit higher,
Than these fine things that startle us
In this new-fangled choir.

Artistic, pa? Is that you, Sam?
You did yourself right proud,
But sonny, please, another time,
Don't grumble quite so loud;
Your mother'd say the same as me
If she had been to church,
And Parson Jones will tell you how
You left him in the lurch.

The sermon and the prayers, my boy,
The reading of the Word,
Are just as necessary as
The singin' like a bird.
Well, there, I'm maybe gettin' old,
But I missed Deacon White;
His raisin' of the tune, for me
Was somehow always right.

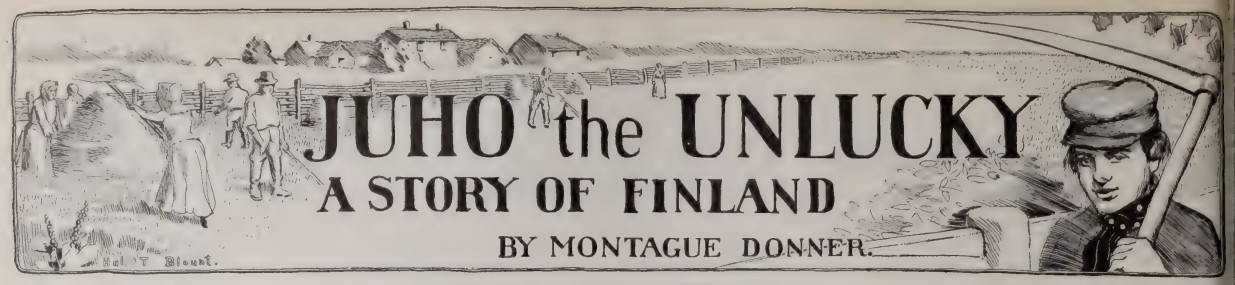
ABNER JENKS.

An Unsuspected Lion in the Way

Much oftener than pastors and church committees, sessions and consistories are aware, young people are deterred from making an open profession of religion, by a dread of the examination they know is before them. They fear they cannot answer questions which may be asked them as to their knowledge, as well as about their faith. "I should not be able to put my belief in words," said a young girl the other day. "It has kept me back from the communion for years, this feeling of terror, in going before the committee." An older woman confessed the same apprehension. That this dread is unreasonable and needless is of course known to Sunday School teachers and ministers, yet it is so often unsuspected, that pains to overcome it are not taken. It has its root, possibly, in a diffidence, possibly in a natural recoil from self-revelation, and possibly, too, in that ignorance of what church membership really implies which is much more general than the worldly-serving fancy. The person who throws aside fear, and steps forward to join the church, is always most cordially met and welcomed, unless, indeed, there be reasonable cause for censure on his or her part. This is extremely unlikely. The minister, who usually has had a preparatory interview, smooths the path of the timid, and so puts questions, that they need no subtle knowledge of theology to answer them aright. The only real indispensable fitness is love for the Saviour, belief in him, and determination by his grace to lead a Christian life and turn away from sin.

Breach of Politeness

Among unmannerly things, a habit of asking direct personal questions which cannot be evaded, and must be answered by an affirmative or a denial, is one of the greatest breaches of etiquette known to good breeding. A parlor is not a court-room, and two people chatting should not be cross-questioned by a cross-examining lawyer and his victim. Yet persons who mean to be polite often violate one of the first laws of courtesy by asking questions about matters which do not concern them. Curiosity is never well-bred, and the inquisitive man or woman who cannot restrain his or her undue interest in a neighbor's affairs is marked as ill-trained socially



JUHO the UNLUCKY

A STORY OF FINLAND

BY MONTAGUE DONNER.

Written Specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

III.

ANTERO'S suspicions had been correct. Juho, whose thoughts dwelt persistently on the maiden left behind in the big farmhouse, with only her mother to keep her company, had been seized with one of the reckless fits that had brought him more than once into collision with the "bonde," and he had determined to take his future into his hands and force the issue with Minna then and there. So, taking the opportunity that presented itself during the luncheon hour, when his companions were scattered in various directions, he slipped off under the lee of the big rocks close to the water, and, entering the woods at a point where he could not be seen from the burning-grounds, he was soon on his way back to the Luhtanen "gard."

When he reached the farmyard he was disagreeably surprised to see a strange wagon under the shed, which circumstance pointed to the presence of visitors who were there to stay overnight, if not longer. In a moment he saw that the purpose of his return would be defeated, and he was smitten with vexation, when it suddenly occurred to him that the Luhtanens' visitor was in all probability none other than the bard Maijala, of whose coming he had been apprised by Paavo.

With a lighter heart, he went briskly up to the door of the cabin, and was about to push it open boldly, when the sound of voices, one of them only too familiar, the other, as far as he could distinguish, that of an entire stranger, caused him to pause, then raise the latch carefully and cautiously push the door slightly ajar. What he saw caused the gathering frown to darken on his face, and a muttered imprecation to rise to his lips. Seated on a bench under the small square window, were Minna and a young man whose appearance and dress at once indicated, not merely a stranger, but a person of a social status somewhat superior to that of the peasantry. The two were engaged in earnest conversation that was evidently of great interest to both, judging from the eager attitude and flowing speech of the youth, and the heightened color and responsive expression of the girl. And, to make matters worse in the eyes of the intruder, there was Bengt Maijala—Maijala himself, on whom Juho had relied as his most important ally—looking on with an expression of smiling approbation!

Maijala, looking round, caught sight of Juho's face in the doorway. He sprang up with a welcoming gesture, and grasping the young man's hand, drew him in.

"Well, Juho, my lad, you delight my eyes before I expected you. I thought you were all at the tar-burning."

Minna had started up with an exclamation of surprise at the sound of Juho's name, and this, with the look of startled inquiry she had cast at him on his unexpected entry, disconcerted him so that he could do nothing but stammer a disconnected reply:

"Yes, so we were—that is, I was there—and now I'm here, you see, as they've almost finished—and I didn't expect to find anyone—that is, you know, strangers—and I had something I wanted to look after here——"

In his confusion, all his fine schemes had suddenly vanished like smoke in the sky, and he stood foolishly twisting his cap round and round in his hands as he looked alternately from Bengt to Minna and back again, while the stranger had risen from his seat and stood looking questioningly at Minna and Juho and the bard in turn. The newcomer turned to Maijala and said, with easy grace, "This gentleman is evidently an old friend of yours; will you not introduce us?"

This was accordingly done, and a few commonplaces exchanged, till Juho found an opportunity to draw Bengt aside and inquire into the identity of his traveling companion, of whom Paavo Saari had made no previous mention.

"Mr. Olaf Nylund is a young musician whom I met just over the Russian border, where he was traveling round studying the popular melodies for some grand opera or something he's going to write. I don't just understand these new-fangled notions about music and mythology and such things that he talks about a great deal, but he's a capital companion, just the same, and he's very glad to listen to my old runes—and to some new ones, too, now and then. And I've made up some pretty good runes, too, in my time——"

"That you have, Bengt, that you have, and you can make a splendid one right here, if you will—one that will live for many a long day among the best you ever composed. Listen, I'll give you an idea."

And Juho proceeded to unfold the story of his feelings for the "bonde's" daughter, together with his plan, in which Maijala was to play so important a part. The bard listened attentively, and after some discussion as to the attitude of the girl herself and that of the father, he promised to do what he could, either that evening or the next, if circumstances should seem propitious.

Bengt did not need any of the reputed magic power of the ancient Finns to perceive that his young friend was not over-pleased to see Minna in such close companionship with the musician, and even if Juho had not requested him to get Olaf out of the way, for the time being at least, he would have found an opportunity to do so in the interest of the young "inhysning." So he very soon called Olaf over to him, and Juho embraced the occasion to ask Minna to come out for a short walk.

"JUHO RUSHED FORWARD AND GRAPPLED WITH THE INFURIATED BEAST"

At first she demurred. "But I must really help mother get the evening meal ready for the others. They will be back in a little while now, and mother is all alone to do the cooking."

Then the feminine promptings of curiosity obtained the mastery, and she continued: "But tell me, what made you come back before the rest? Is anything wrong up there?"

"No, nothing up there," in a tone full of significance.

"Anywhere else, then?"

"Well, no, not exactly; perhaps—that depends upon you."

"Upon me! Why, Juho Wanhala, what do you mean? You are playing at riddles at the wrong hour."

"Do you want to solve this riddle quickly?"

"Oh, I don't know that I'm particularly anxious." This was always Minna's way when Juho appeared to become a little too pressing. She looked at him with an arch smile and a lifting of the eyebrows.

"Minna, I tell you this is real earnest now. There is really something wrong, and it is something nearer home than the burning-grounds, too. If you will go out with me just to the end of the path along the edge of the woods, I will tell you all about it; that is, if you think you can leave your interesting friend over there for a little while," indicating Olaf with a sign of the head.

Minna gave a half-constrained little laugh and blushed slightly. "What is he to me? Silly boy, I do believe you're jealous! Well, well, if it is really so important, I'll go with you; but only to the corner of the field, mind!"

Whether Minna had any inkling of what it was that was on Juho's mind who shall say? At any rate, she manifested only a moderate degree of surprise, together with some annoyance—whether real or pretended Juho could not quite determine—when the young "inhysning" poured out his heart to her. Nor would she give a satisfactory answer, no matter how strenuously he pleaded. In the bitterness of his disappointment, he was ill-advised enough to hint at her infatuation for the young stranger, with whom she had been holding converse before his arrival.

"Now, Juho, you are foolish—downright foolish," she declared, with a touch of petulancy that was no doubt due to the fact that she probably, in her heart of hearts, acknowledged that there was, after all, a grain of truth in the accusation. "And I don't want to hear any more on this subject from you, Juho, you understand?" she continued, with a little toss of the head. "We must be friends—just friends—and that's all."

But Juho persisted. "Minna, I can no longer remain on the old footing with you. Do you think that I am a block of wood, to be near you day after day, and not feel the desire to let my heart speak? Minna, I may be only an "inhysning" at present, only 'Juho the Unlucky,' as you are fond of saying in your bantering way, but I swear to you that I shall before very many years be able to offer you a little home of my own. Minna, don't you see that you are breaking my heart by your refusal to listen to me?"

"But, Juho, what is the use of all this? Have I not told you clearly that I don't care for you well enough to be more than a simple friend to you?"

"But you will, you will care—only say you will not give yourself to anyone else, and I will wait, wait a year, two years—and I am sure I will make you care for me——"

"No, no, Juho, you must not press me like this. Don't be so violent; you frighten me. I can make you no promises——"

"Yes, you must, Minna; I am desperate. I cannot go on living like this, without at least the hope of winning you ere long. You must——"

"Must, again! Juho Wanhala, you forget yourself. I will not have you talk to me like this!"

"Ah! you think yourself above me. You would talk to me as Karin does, and reproach me with being a paltry 'inhysning'! No, I am something more, and you know it! I can fight for the future, I can work, and think and put by for a home; but I must have you to work and dream for, Minna—I cannot let you go now—nay, I will not, let your father say what he may!"

"Juho, let go of me! You are hurting me."

"Tell me you will listen to my prayer, then, promise me——"

"Oh! what, what can I promise you? What can I—oh! help, help! Aaro!"

Just then Minna, frightened and fluttering in Juho's half-frenzied grasp, had caught sight of her brother in the van of the returning party, and cried out to him for assistance.

IV.

In a moment Aaro had come rushing up, and a volley of blows were exchanged before the others had time to interpose. Minna fell almost fainting into the arms of her sister, and there was tremendous excitement, with a Babel of cries and counter-cries. Bengt Maijala came hurrying out of the house, and at sight of him there was a sudden cessation of the hubbub, the more so, since the tar-burners had no knowledge of the arrival of a guest they were all wont to revere, and instantly experienced a sensation of shame that such a scene should have been enacted in his presence.

Maijala looked at the shrinking, frightened form of Minna, then at the flushed and scowling faces of Juho and Aaro, and a look of indescribable pain came into his old countenance.

"Juho, Juho, boy, what have you done? Have you no care?" He went up to the youth, and put a hand sadly on his shoulder. Juho dropped his arms by his side and hung his head. He turned silently on his heel and made his way to one of the outhouses, great sobs beginning to shake his frame.

Bengt Maijala turned to the crowd: "My friends," he said, "I had come among you hoping to spend a quiet day or two of happiness with you; but I cannot sing my old runes to you as I had hoped. I will ask your leave to bide the night, now that it is so late, and in the morning I must be on my way again."

There were cries of protest from many quarters, but the bard only shook his head and turned back into the house with a heavy mien. Aaro went muttering into the big common eating and living room, and flung himself down by the great brick stove, where the mother was busy with the pots and pans in preparation for the evening meal.

"Mother" he said, "it's got to come at last. Juho has to get out, or there'll be serious trouble before many hours are past."

Fru Luhtanen had been a spectator of a part of the affray from the window, and although she had no active dislike for the young "inhysning," and had never been to any particular pains to keep her eldest daughter out of his way, her maternal instinct quickly ranged her on her son's side.

"I suppose so, Aaro; though it does seem a pity for the old man and the elder brother, who are good, peaceable, hard-working souls."

Aaro gave a grunt. "We've nothing against them, and they don't need to go," he said. "But if they can't let that young grumbler and hothead go by himself, they'll have to share his lot, that's all. And it'll make it easier for the rest of us, too, for judging by the looks of things at present, it is going to be a question, before many weeks are over, how we are going to face famine and keep the family alive, anyhow, without any extra mouths to feed."

"I know it. I know it," sighed Fru Luhtanen, looking up at the pieces of hard rye and bark bread, strung up on poles among the rafters. "I'm afraid it won't be long before we shall be eating our famine bread alone! Though God knows I shall miss old Lippo—worthy, peaceable body enough."

The meal went off in embarrassing quiet. Juho did not show himself at all, and Antero, who had sat moody and silent through it all, finally got up from the table and went to seek him. In ten minutes he came back, looking disturbed. He went up to his father, and then to Maijala, who was sitting on a corner of the low brick fire-place, thrumming his kantele disconsolately, and whispered in the ear of each. All three went out, and were gone about half an hour. They returned with grave faces.

"Juho is not to be found anywhere," said Maijala, turning to Fru Luhtanen. "We followed his footprints as far as the corner of the fields, at the edge of the woods to the east, and then they disappeared where the rocky ground begins. I fear the lad may have done himself a mischief."

Aaro laughed sneeringly. "Not much fear of that. A man by his word, an ox by his horns! That fellow has too much harm for others brewing in his brain to have any to spare for his own hide!"

"Look here, Aaro," replied Antero, flushing slightly under his well-browned skin, "I've never quarreled with you, and I don't want to, but please keep your ill-tempered remarks about my brother to yourself. I know him much better than you do. So say nothing more, as I would like to respect your mother's presence."

Aaro had a wholesome respect for Antero's prowess, which had been put to the proof on more than one occasion at play and in the hunt, and thought prudence the wisest policy. He merely shrugged his shoulders, stretched his legs, and replied in a pacificatory tone:

"Oh, well, no offense intended to you, Antero. I've no malice against your brother; but I hope you won't mind my saying that it's out of the question for him to stay with us any longer."

"I see that, unfortunately; but that is no reason why I should let him harm himself now if I can do anything to help him. So I'm going down to the tar-burning grounds again, as he may have gone that way."

"Oh, do," exclaimed Karin, who had been sitting silently by, full of conflicting emotions. "If I were a man, I would go with you."

"Karin!" exclaimed her mother, reproachfully. Karin jumped up and hurried out of the room, exclaiming as she went, "I think it's simply horrible," leaving her hearers to put any interpretation on her words that they chose.

"Antero, I'm going with you," said Lippo Wanhala, his voice trembling. "I couldn't rest to-night, and I have to be up at the burning-grounds early in the morning, anyhow."

But his son remonstrated strongly, fearing the effects on his father of the additional excitement and fatigue, and it was finally decided that Aaro, who had by this time recovered from his ill-humor, and who began to share the uneasiness of the Wanhalas respecting Juho's purposes, should accompany Antero on his night search. The two accordingly started off to scour the forest and the river banks.

We must now return to Juho, whom we left on his way to the friendly shelter of one of the outhouses that surrounded the "bonde's" farmhouse. He sat down on a small boulder that rose from the ground right against the wall of the "bad-stuga," and, burying his face in his hands, gave way to the agony of remorse.

"I have disgraced myself," he moaned; "I have shamed my father and brother, and filled the old bard's heart with sorrow. I have lowered myself in Minna's eyes forever. What have I then to live for?"

For a time the sobs shook his frame convulsively. Then he became quiet, staring with tear-dimmed eyes into the dark shadows of the forest.

He got up and stretched out his arms, as if in appeal to the dumb forces of nature. Then he started blindly forward. Moodily he strode along the little path along the edge of the fields, bordering on the woods, and having reached the rocks at the northeastern corner of the farm-lands, he plunged into the forest. He had a vague idea of ending all his troubles by leaping off the cliffs into the river, close by the tar-burning grounds. He followed a barely perceptible track through the forest, that led eventually into the road not far from the point where the latter began its rise up the incline on which the char-pit had been dug. He had just reached the junction, when, from behind a huge mass of jagged granite rose a form, and a voice called out:

"So here comes the grumbler and shirker, who lets others do the hard work while he goes idling and dreaming around. A nice fellow, isn't he, to live on others, and then shirk the work he should be doing to earn his bed and board! What brings you here at this time of night, prowling around when all honest workers are minding their own business?"

It was Wilho Luhtanen who addressed him in this most unceremonious fashion. In a moment Juho had flung himself upon Wilho and seized him by the throat.

"You villainous slanderer!" he shrieked, rather than cried. "I'll teach you what it is to lie about an honest man, and to insult him to his face. I'll make you regret your words!"

Wilho was overborne by the unexpected rapidity and fury of the attack, and was soon on his back in the dust of the road. He was by no means, however, a contemptible foe, and soon succeeded in extricating himself from Juho's first grasp. A furious struggle for the mastery was under way, when suddenly an unearthly shriek, as of some demoniac spirit, rent the air. The two men loosed each other, and stared at one another with affrighted eyes. As they stood, panting and dishevelled, opposite to each other, a groan, as of a man in mortal agony, was heard, followed by the sound of scuffling at some little distance.

"Oh, God! My father!" exclaimed Wilho. "Something has happened to him."

And he turned to run up the slope, but with a cry of dismay stopped short. A spasm of pain shot across his face. "My knee," he cried, "I have wrenched it. Go on, for God's sake, and see what—"

But Juho needed no urging. A new resolve had seized him, and in a trice he was speeding up the slope toward the charcoal pile, whence he was sure the sounds proceeded.

He saw Matti engaged in a death-struggle with an enormous bear. As he hurried forward, he saw the infuriated animal, with the blood streaming over its breast, deliver a terrific blow that brought Matti to his knees, and knocked his knife out of his hand. In another moment the victorious bear would have crushed the life out of the defenseless man. With a yell that distracted the creature's attention for a moment, Juho rushed madly, recklessly forward, unsheathing his hunting knife as he ran, and with a quick movement drove it up to the hilt under the shaggy monster's upraised forepaw, and grappled with the infuriated beast, pushing it back upon the charcoal oven with the force of his onward rush. In another moment he was in the grasp of the great creature. He felt its warm life-blood gushing out over his head and shoulders; he felt his ribs cracking beneath the awful pressure of those gigantic limbs, and his eyes started out of their sockets. He felt the bear sink back upon the smoking pile and himself being dragged helplessly with it. He had a vague sense of a human form creeping toward him, as the smoke began to fill his nostrils. In the midst of the agony that racked his poor, mutilated body, he mustered up strength enough to murmur:

"You're safe, Matti. I'm glad—never mind me—tell—Minna—I died—because—I—was—no use to—anyone—yes, you're—saved to her—I'm happy—had luck—at last—O, God! happy—at last!—good-bye, father—Antero—good-bye—I'm happy now—don't you—see?—Minna, forgive—it's—all—for—the—best—Min—na!"

And so, Wilho, supported by Antero and Aaro, coming on the scene a half-hour later, found him crushed in the frightful hug of the dead monarch of the Finnish forests, as it lay upon the smoking charcoal oven, with the senseless form of Matti lying a few feet away, with one arm outstretched toward the pile, as if he had made a last desperate effort to reach his rescuer, and draw him from the cruel grasp of the dying bear, and the equally pitiless doom of the white, up-curling smoke.

Sad in very truth was the home-coming that night. Matti indeed recovered, but who shall describe the sorrow that lay in many hearts, tempered only by the thought that the simple annals of Finland's peasant-folk had another hero to add to its rolls? And what great poet may excel in his most famous song the simple, heart-rending pathos which breathed in the rune that Bengt Maijala composed that day in the Finnish peasant cabin over the body of Juho the Unlucky, transfigured to Juho the Happy?

Australia's Temperance Veteran

My sister in New York sends her CHRISTIAN HERALDS regularly to me every month. After reading them, I pass them on to three or four good Christian people in Sidney, who take a great interest in the spread of the Gospel. They all state the reading and teaching of your paper to be the best of any they have ever been privileged to see. When the papers are returned, I forward them to my wife's father. He is over eighty. For over fifty years he has been a temperance lecturer and has done great good. For many years he lived in Tasmania. He came to New South Wales seven years ago, and went to live in the "far west," at Peak Hill, which is near a large gold mine. The old gentleman was at once appointed town clerk, secretary to the hospital, correspondent to the Sidney Morning Herald; and was ordained lay reader in the Episcopal Church. He virtually, when past three-score and ten, started life over again in a new place, and his record shows the strength and vitality a non-drinker may possess at advanced years. H. C. JENKS.

THE NOVA SCOTIA MISSION BAND

BLUEBERRIES FOR A BIBLE

SOME youthful philanthropists of Nova Scotia took upon themselves some time ago the support of an orphan in India. The little Hindu's missionary teacher wrote that the child wanted a Bible of his own. The Nova Scotia Mission Band (the name of this group of philanthropists), said, Yes, indeed, their boy must have a Bible, and that they should be the ones to give it. They were sustaining him with their own earnings, and the fruit of their own self-denial. So, why should any one else give their boy a Bible? Of course they had parents who would have provided the funds, but that was not their desire.

What was to hinder them from making the money when blueberries grew for the plucking by the waysides, and in the fields. Such beautiful, large berries as are only found in Nova Scotia, but which, in season, folks in Boston must have for their breakfast tables. They picked and sold blueberries, and bought their boy a very handsome Bible, one with large print, that might be easily read.

In India, a dark-eyed, brown-skinned lad pores over the sacred Book they sent him. And when he is older, perhaps he may bear to others the blessed messages which came to him through the little blueberry pickers of the Baptist Sunday School at Forbes' Point, near Yarmouth, who for this and other good deeds they have done, are duly entitled to be called the Nova Scotia Mission Band.

A KING ARRAIGNED

Paul as a Prisoner Exhorting His Judges

By Mrs. M. Baxter

AT his conversion, it was declared that Paul must bear the name of Christ "before kings" (Acts 9: 13). Ere he suffered death for his faith he would stand twice before Nero, the Roman emperor, but first he must stand before Herod Agrippa—the last of the Herods. This king was on a visit to Festus, with his wife Bernice, and Festus mentioned Paul's case to him, and the difficulty he found in framing an indictment against Paul which should convict him of breaking either Jewish or Roman law, showing that what had aggravated the Jews was not any evil-doing on his part, but his assertion that Jesus was alive. "For," he said, "it seemeth to me unreasonable in sending a prisoner not withal to signify the charge against him" (R. V.). Agrippa became interested in this unusual prisoner, and desired to hear him himself. The hand of God was in this. Paul's Master was tried before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate, but neither of them had convicted him of sin. Paul had been declared innocent of every sin worthy of death by Claudius Lycias, Felix, and Festus, and now it was necessary that Agrippa also should give judgment that Paul was not worthy of death, that Paul might the better represent his Lord in Rome.

Agrippa gave Paul the word, who, with the utmost courtesy, spoke of the happiness it gave him that he might plead his cause before the king, because he was "expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews" (Acts 26: 1-3, R. V.). After alluding to his early life as a strict Pharisee, he said, "Now I stand here to be judged for the hope of the promise made unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes, earnestly serving God night and day, hope to attain."

How powerful must have been Paul's appeal to King Agrippa! "Concerning this hope I am accused by the Jews, O king! Why is it judged incredible with you if God doth raise the dead?" After this introduction, there was an overwhelming force in the testimony of his call from heaven. There were no half-measures in the hatred of Saul of Tarsus against Christ and his followers, and there were no half-measures in his following career. Paul was a man whose antecedents were well known in Jerusalem and Judea, and the truth of whose statements could be easily proved. No one sought to disprove what he said of his unconverted days. He had been the Pharisee and persecutor he described; the change in him was an undoubted one: he told the supernatural means by which that change took place. But his story, if true, was a proof of the resurrection, and of the fact that Jesus himself was risen, and that he whom the Jews had crucified, was both Lord and Christ; their very looked-for Messiah. If this was so, it meant something for all his hearers. It meant that Festus, Agrippa, and Bernice, must take their places as believers in, or rejectors of, the Jews' Messiah, the Saviour of the world. Paul spoke with this in view, much more than his own justification; he spoke more as a minister and witness of Christ than as a prisoner pleading for his acquittal.

He continues: "Wherefore, O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision." Here is the main point with us all. When we get a light from heaven, either through the study of the Word of God, or, as with Saul of Tarsus, by some direct light from God by his Spirit as to his Will, there must be an instant decision to obey at all costs; otherwise God is dishonored, the Spirit of God is grieved; and our heart is hardened. It is an unspeakably awful sin to say No, to God. Saul of Tarsus knew what it meant for him. He would lose his position with the chief priests, with his learned friends and with his own family. He would be a nobody in Jerusalem, and among his own people. He would be regarded as a fanatic and a follower of a crucified criminal. But if indeed that One was the Christ, all he would suffer was not worth mentioning.

Paul of Tarsus was "not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but declared both to them of Damascus first, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the country of Judea that they should repent and turn to God, doing works worthy of repentance. "For this cause the Jews seized me in the temple, and essayed to kill me." Having therefore obtained the help that is from God—his life was saved—I stand unto this day testifying both to small and great, saying nothing but what the prophets and Moses did say should come, how that the Christ must first suffer, and how that he first by the resurrection of the dead should proclaim light both to Jews and Gentiles."

Such was Paul's defence, such was the account he gave of his conversion and its results, such was his justification of his ministry among Jews and Gentiles. If he was mistaken, at any rate he had the courage of his convictions, and if he was not mistaken, every man who heard him and all who read this Scripture are sinners against God and against their own souls, if they do not at any cost, turn fully to the Lord and follow him.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

What three proper names mentioned in Scripture do these pictures represent?

Write "Competition 39" plainly across the top of a postal card or sheet of paper; next, your name, age and address; then the answers. For each of the three answers employ but one word—the proper name which you think the pictures represent. Don't quote Scripture passages; simply state the name. Below the answer, write, in not over twenty words, what, in your judgment, are the most important facts concerning the subject of the first of these pictures? Read the rules given below.

RULES AND PRIZES

Contests are not open to competitors over fourteen years of age. Do not send two solutions. There is no objection to asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting. Should you use paper instead of a postal card, be sure to write on the envelope in which you enclose your answer "Competition 39." Write on one side of paper only.

All answers must be mailed not later than May 18, Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Little Folks' Department, Bible House, N. Y.

Answers to Competition 34, in our issue of April 8, are: 1. Antioch. 2. Mary. 3. Samaria. At Antioch, the first Gentile Church was established; disciples were first called Christians; thence Paul started on three missionary journeys.

POWER AND PRAYER*

The Central Principle of Christianity the Impartation of Divine Strength

EVERY evangelist, teacher and preacher has at some period of his work realized how inoperative are his best efforts. He may have labored with all his mind and soul to prove to his hearers, what is their duty; his logic may be faultless, his arguments unanswerable, his conclusions sound and yet there may be no result. It is disappointing to have an audience listen with perfect agreement, yet without the least disposition to incorporate in the life the lessons inculcated. The Master himself was not without the experience. "Ye call me Lord," he said, "but ye do not the things that I say." One could almost better bear opposition and resistance than this dull, lifeless agreement which produces no action.

Those who have suffered thus, have only to look into their own hearts to understand the phenomenon. Our ever present and individual need is power. We are convinced, we desire the blessing, we even go so far as to resolve, but we have sadly to confess, as did the apostle, that the thing we would, we do not, and the thing that we hate, that we do. The problem is the universal one that presents itself to men of every clime, as it did to our forefathers. How can we translate into act and conduct the resolves of our mind and heart?

The answer is the great central principle of Christianity. Power is given to those who believe. There seems to our minds no clear connection between faith and power, but experience proves that there is. There is a subtle union between natures which come close together in communion. It is even so between friends. The man who has a pure, elevated companion, in whose society he spends much of his time, is braced and invigorated by the influence of his friend. He takes higher, nobler views of life. What then must be the effect of time spent in prayer? No one, who has not tried it, has any conception of the effect of a whole hour passed in conscious communion with the Unseen. There may not be spoken words. The going forth of the heart to God in desire may be in silence, yet there is an elevating effect in contact, which gives not only power in conduct, but power in Christian service.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society and Baptist Young People's Union for May 24. Acts 1: 13, 14; 2: 1-4, 41.

Keep in the Face the Sunshine

THOUGH the clouds of trouble lower,
And the rains of trouble fall;
Though the lightnings of disaster
And its thunders do appal;
Though from happiness and pleasure
You may seem forever part—
Keep in the face the sunshine,
Though there's shadow in the heart!

When the waves of disappointment
Rise high around your soul;
When your ship of life is driven
Fast on ruin's hidden shoal;
When from happiness and pleasure
You are still forever part;
Keep in the face the sunshine,
Though there's shadow in the heart!

For that better time is coming,
In God's own appointed way;
If not the now, the morrow
May be the wished-for day,
When from happiness and pleasure
You'll no more forever part;
Within the face the sunshine
Will be sunshine in the heart.

HOSPITALITY FOR THE LITTLE ONES

"CAN you take this child to the country this summer?" The speaker handed our Fresh-Air worker a slip bearing this: "Richard D——.; delicate boy of twelve. Small, half-starved. Needs country air, care and good food." Richard will be an early guest at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home this summer. Earnest appeals for outings for children of the tenements come from many workers among the poor. Every year the slums, dense with teeming thousands; the children in the crowded, wretched abodes suffer more from fierce heat, evil odors and other ills common to such miserable, suffocating quarters. It is the part of Christian kindness for all in happier ease, to stretch helping hands to little ones who have not enough even of God's pure air; and every summer, since our Children's Home opened, our readers have co-operated nobly and generously with us in bringing health, comfort and some measure of childish pleasure into these crowded little lives.

We try to choose the very poorest, neediest, most neglected waifs that we can find. Yet multitudes of our children belong to very worthy and respectable families. Sometimes, a workingman, who has by honest toil kept the wolf from his door, falls ill or dies. The cozy little home, sustained by his slender income, is threatened now. Even a kind landlord cannot forbear forever when rents fall due; a grasping one will not. A fear of a dispossession hangs over the troubled wife and mother; her little ones are hungry—sometimes neglected—for she is nurse, housekeeper and bread-winner, all in one; perhaps, they, too, fall sick. It is not charity, but simply brotherly duty to help such an one. In what way can she better be aided than by taking the whole little brood off her hands, carrying them to the country and keeping, or making, them well and strong?

Sometimes, a poor widow supporting her family by her needle, herself falls ill, and must be carried to a hospital. Pending her recovery, what better can be done than take the children to Mont-Lawn? It is not charity; it is but making use of Christian privilege when we do this. All the children in the picture on this page were guests at one time last summer at Mont-Lawn. Through no fault of her own, the worthy mother was temporarily much embarrassed—just the measure of help afforded by sympathizing friends in fresh air work tided her over hard places until a better time came in her affairs. Fresh-air relief (which is simply the extension of Christian care and hospitality to little children who need it), may be a help to sensitive people who would shrink from other aid.

SOME FRESH-AIR GUESTS—A WORTHY FAMILY

Sadder cases are little ones from evil homes; from homes made wretched by drink-crazed parents. On all sides childhood in dumb-anguish looks appeal even when lips do not plead, "Please, may we go to Mont-Lawn?" Will you who read help us to answer, "Yes?" Only $3 gives one child an outing of ten days at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; and so on; $21 supports a cot for the season. All contributions sent to this paper will be promptly acknowledged. Gifts of clothing (anything a child can wear will be welcome), should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Charming Book for Girls†

IN the old days there used to be week-day books and Sunday books. All week-day books and newspapers were put away on Saturday night, and on Sunday it was only the very best literature that dared to show itself upon the tables.

Janet Ward, novel though it is, might have remained out. It is a book for girls and, so it happens, the first novel ever written by that loved and famous journalist, Margaret E. Sangster. The story concerns a girl of to-day—a very charming girl—and the event of her college career, of her work among the mountain whites of Tennessee, and afterwards among the poor of New York, will appeal to the interests of a wide circle of readers. In the book you discover many passages of the kind you like to read aloud.

"Mothers have more to sacrifice than girls dream, when they send their daughters away. The college class-room is the unseen battle-ground where some mothers, as well as many daughters, fight the good fight and win the victory."

"One's mercies sometimes use up and challenge us, filling us with compunction at the base way we take them for granted."

"To giggle at nothing, for the pure pleasure of being alive—this is one of girlhood's monopolies."

"There is always an unspoken feeling that the pastor is the head servant of the parish."

"Everybody knows the flat taste of a life that is without the savor of congenial occupation."

"One may plan for herself, and ask advice of her friends, and lead an anxious life lest her plans miscarry, while all the time events are shaping themselves in ways better than one has dared to hope."

"Most true women are captivated by masterfulness in man. Few brides wish the word, 'obey,' omitted from the marriage ceremony."

"The home where the man has to dread the weird of a drunken wife, is a hundred times worse and more like a pit, than the home to which a drunken husband brings woe and terror. The latter is a home desecrated indeed, but the former is a sanctuary profaned."

"A home is ideal only as it is the home of a single family. No household is equipped for tranquil living when an outsider enters its doors."

"Occasionally in this strange world of ours, it happens that a bigger trouble comes along and blunts the edge of several smaller ones."

The White Rose Home

A Social Settlement for Negro Working Girls

MRS. VIRGINIA EARLE MATTHEWS

THE story of the White Rose Mission, founded by Mrs. Virginia Earle Matthews, is not unknown to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. The White Rose was planted, six years ago, when Mrs. Matthews, with a few other colored women, undertook to apply the social settlement idea to the most ignorant and depraved class of negroes in New York. The children were drawn into the kindergarten, and effort was made to shelter and teach colored girls and women, and to influence them to lead a pure life; encouragement was given to honest working girls to remain honest, and protection and help provided for the friendless stranger just arrived until she could find work with respectable employers. The idea was God-given; but with no one at hand to help, except by personal service, the way was one of struggle for the settlement, in its three dingy rooms in East Ninety-seventh street.

After five years of what seemed to be hopeless striving, Mrs. Matthews made an appeal which was not in vain. A few earnest white women, inspired by the desire and purpose to help, became patronesses of the work, and one benevolent lady gave for a considerable term the rent of the house, 217 East Eighty-sixth street, where the White Rose Home for Working Girls is now located. Others furnished it. The basement is used for the cooking classes and kindergarten; on the walls are Scripture texts and mottoes. Everything is extremely neat. The kitchen is always in perfect order. On the first floor is the parlor. Here the girls are allowed to receive their friends at suitable hours. Some industrious young women have paid for a piano out of their hard earnings. There is a flourishing mandolin club. The back parlor is used for the weekly religious meeting. There is, too, a weekly mothers' meeting, and children are taught basket weaving; boys have lessons in chair caning. On the second floor is Mrs. Matthews' private office, where she receives any one interested in the work, and here she carries on her correspondence. In the back room, and in a dormitory on the third floor, are fourteen neat iron bedsteads, covered with white counterpanes. These beds are always occupied, and there is demand for more. The charge is fifty cents a week for a bed; and girls are allowed to cook for themselves in the basement, buying materials outside, or having it supplied at very low cost by the Settlement. Mrs. Matthews' sister is matron.

Lately an Employment Bureau, which undertakes to supply competent servants, has been organized; a fee is asked of employers seeking its service. A class has also been formed for making delicacies for the sick, and for fine diet-cooking, so much needed in nursing. Dressmaking, and sewing are taught.

The object of the mission is to confer the benefits of an industrial school, with the protection of a home. Mrs. Matthews personally meets the steamships on their arrival at this port, and she has enlisted the good offices of the police in guarding unsuspicious girls who, on their arrival, might be carried away by unprincipled men, professing to be employment agents. Her kindly hand and sympathizing heart has saved many a wayfarer. From the White Rose Home they may go into service at once, or remain there three months, taking the housework course, which includes instruction in cooking, in making beds, washing dishes, setting tables, serving meals, and laundry work. Fine laundry work is a specialty.

The work is undenominational, and dependent upon voluntary contributions. Any inquiries will be answered by Mrs. Virginia Earle Matthews, White Rose Home for Working Girls, 217 East Eighty-sixth street, New York City.

Another Native Filipino Evangelist

IT is cheering to learn of the excellent progress the Gospel is making in Manila and its suburbs. Evangelist Nicolas Zamora and his corps of native workers are very ably supplementing and extending the efforts of the various American missionaries. Recently there appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD brief sketches of two of Pastor Zamora's associates, who have been put into the field by the contributions of our readers. To-day we print a letter from another, Joel Bautista, who is also doing faithful service for Christ among his fellow-countrymen. He writes:

In your last letter to the Rev. Nicolas Zamora you requested an account of the circumstances of the conversion of each one of the persons nominated for preachers under the direction of Rev. Nicolas Zamora. I am one of those.

From 1889 until 1898, I served as sacristan at the cathedral in the city of Manila, and during that time, as a good Christian, "according to the Roman Church" followed all her rules, because I then believed that only through her could salvation be attained. One day, however, while in the home of the parish curate of the church in which I served, Senor Don Paulino Zamora, brother of the curate, came, full of joy because of the expiration of the period of his deportation (for the sole crime of having a copy of the Bible), bringing with him the good news of the Saviour. He was the first to bring (of course in secret) during the time of the Friars, copies of the Holy Scriptures, or Bible.

He called me to him, and told me those words of our divine Saviour in the Gospel of John 14: 6, "I am the way, the truth and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me." That same day he presented me with a copy of the New Testament. I soon afterward saw the errors of Roman Catholicism, and also that I had been in darkness for many years.

Two months after the arrival of the Americans, and their taking possession, Rev. James B. Rodgers became the first pastor of the Presbyterian Mission in these islands. From him, in company with all the family of the above mentioned Sr. Paulino Zamora, I received baptism on the 17th of October, 1898. One of this family is at present Rev. Nicolas Zamora. From 1899 until the present date I have been a local preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

I desire to express many thanks for the favors which you and our brothers in America are showing to us. It is my prayer that God, through the mediation of his beloved Son, may always bless both you and your efforts. JOEL BAUTISTA.

THE GOSPEL ON THE FROZEN DEEP

stays all the year. Fog is very prevalent, especially on the southern portion of the coast. Anchorages are poor, owing to the rocky nature of the bottom, and the lead-line little help, as the depths vary from a hundred fathoms to a few feet in a hundred yards, often enough. In many places, one can strike the bowsprit on the cliffs before taking up on the keel. Thus, we are not so ashamed of the fact that we have had accidents to our mission boats, and to counterbalance it we can claim to have salved quite a number of sailing craft, and at least one large steamer.

"In 1896, realizing the hopelessness of treating so many diseases, the result of poverty alone, and having learned by bitter experience that the doling out of promiscuous charity was no remedy for that disease, we decided to attack the root of the evil, viz: the truck system. We opened a cash co-operative store in South Labrador, the people putting into the capital whatever they could afford. This move has been an unqualified success. There are now five stores of the same kind scattered along the coast, and though all crude and the creation of men absolutely untrained to business methods, they pay their way; they have in places nearly halved the prices of the necessities of life, have inculcated thrift, and have so improved the condition of the settlers around, that want of essentials in their neighborhood is almost unknown now. Houses are improved, and children, being better clad, can go to school.

"We now possess also a seventy-ton schooner, which serves all the stores, carrying freights of goods down, and of fish, seals, and oil up to St. Johns.

"To try and increase the wage-earning capacity of the people in the most populous and poorest portion of our district, we have taken a grant of timber land, and erected a steam lumber mill. For women we have introduced, especially north, an embroidery industry, as yet, alas, on a small scale. We procure for them silk, embroidery cotton, beads, and lining material. With these the people make of smoked deerskin, of sealskin, of feathers or damaged furs, many little useful embroidered pouches, cushions, caps, letter-cases, etc., which we endeavor to sell for them. Indeed, the doctors are always teaching methods of endeavoring to put to remunerative purposes, things and time, formerly thrown away as useless.

"Being myself strongly convinced of the great value of public games, we have introduced football in many places, and started the young—and even the old folk—turning their attention away occasionally from the grindstone, and occupying spare times in the long, idle winter evenings, when much of the devil's work on the coast is done, by having club-rooms opened all the winter.

"Our ideal as Christian workers is to stand in the same relationship to every aspect of our people's lives, that we believe our Master would, if he were here to-day; and so, by diffusing the fragrance of the knowledge of him in every place, reflecting, however feebly, that great love, faith in which we are anxious to instil as the true and only source of salvation in this world, as well as the next. Not by precept, but by practice, is the message of the Gospel to be conveyed to those whom constant contact with the hard things of life has compelled to test things by their utility. The fisherman's philosophy is comprised in the results of his own observation. 'Here,' he says, 'is Bill. I see what he is; I know what he was. What has worked the change? He was as weak as I am; now how strong and good he is! Will the thing that has changed him change me?' That is the way they look at things and think about them. With nothing between him and a lea shore but half a mile of breakers, with nothing between him and eternity but a deal plank, the fisherman does not concern himself about theological niceties, but yearns for a God who will hear his prayer, and wants to know whether he can, as a fisherman, start to serve and follow that God without making such a failure of it as to bring upon him the reproach of hypocrisy, which is of all things the thing most hateful to a sailor.

"They are men with strong passions. Their life is made up of periods of monotony, broken by periods of utter freedom and license. There comes the great trial of their lives. The mission tries, and is succeeding, in driving out the devil's agents which have so long preyed on these men, and it has found that the only way is by providing better things for them, and placing them within their reach. Of course such work is expensive. The hospitals afloat and ashore on the Labrador coast cost twenty thousand dollars a year. Nor is the money the only cost. During the twenty-two years of the mission's work, fourteen vessels with their crews have been lost. It is sorrowful, but without loss no crown was ever won. We are encouraged by the changes we have seen in the men. They appreciate our help; they regard us as their friends; they know we are disinterested, and are trying to do them good. We need the help of the Christian public. We willingly risk our lives and gladly bear the hardships of the life, but we want money to meet the expenses. Any gifts sent for the work to R. Lewis Morris, care Messrs. Thomas Nevius & Son, 45 Wall St., New York, or to Dr. W. T. Grenfell, St. Johns, Newfoundland, will be heartily welcome."

PUBLIC WORSHIP*

A Means of Grace Contributing to the Development of Spiritual Life

FROM the beginning to the end of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the author brings into vivid contrast the position of the Christian with the Jew. Whether the epistle was written by Paul, as our version has it in its superscription, or by Apollos, as many believe, or by some author whose name has been lost, matters little to us now. It is evident that whosoever it was, the man was a scholar deeply versed in Jewish law and tradition. No Christian can read the epistle without devout thankfulness for the privileges of this dispensation, and a profound admiration for the skill with which the evolution from the Jewish to the Christian dispensation is traced. If any one supposes that the Christian is under obligations less stringent than was the Jew, or that the righteousness demanded of him is of a lower order, this espistle undeceives him. It shows that the shadow has become the substance, the privileges are higher and closer, and the obligations more binding.

One of the obligations defined is the attendance on public worship. It is true that now no ornate temple service is provided. There are now no sacrifices, no ancient ritual, but instead, there is spiritual communion and a spiritual blessing that even the gorgeous temple rites failed to give. The worshiper is no longer thrilled with awe, but he approaches nearer to the Divine presence and becomes one with the spirits of just men, made perfect, and with the innumerable company of angels. He enters the inner circle, in which the goodness of God and his love and tenderness are felt, instead of terror at his majesty and power. There is therefore stronger reason for the Christian's presence than the Jew could have felt.

It is doubtful, however, whether the Christian feels, as did the Jew, the obligation to be in his place in the sanctuary when God is worshiped. Yet there are many reasons why he should be there. There is a contagion of feeling that is helpful. The atmosphere is changed by the presence of many people having the same object in view. Mere contact has an influence which we cannot explain, but which is very real. Besides this, there are revelations of God's presence in his house that we get nowhere else, and there is, more than all, the sense of a common membership, a fellowship and comradeship which are a spiritual tonic to the soul. However close and sweet are the exercises of the closet, he misses much whose place in the public assembly is unnecessarily and frequently vacant.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

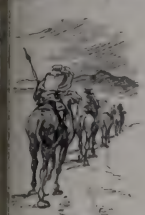
By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXXI
Traveler's Psalm

1. I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. 2. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth.



"UNTO THE HILLS"

3. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber. 4. Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. 5. The Lord is thy keeper: the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand.

Queer folk are they who live as if this world were home. It is not: we are pilgrims, and as the doorway of birth opened to let us in to the doorway of death will open to let us out. It will soon swing, sooner, maybe, than we think. This Psalm is for the passage through and the journey we make by land and sea. People who look to the hills for help, get it, and day and night are preserved. This is a good Psalm for sour saints.

PSALM CXXII
Jerusalem Psalm

1. I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord.

"WITHIN THY GATES"

2. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem!" the old, where He walked and talked and died. "Jerusalem" the new, where He has gone to prepare a place for us. Folk of old trusted, and after long waiting He came. Now we trust, and after due waiting shall go to Him. With sin, the old Jerusalem has lost its glory; the Holy City without sin, will never fade or dim.

PSALM CXXIII
Look Up Psalm

1. Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens 2. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us.

"AS THE EYES OF SERVANTS"

If you want to be miserable—look within. If you want to be disturbed—look about you. If you want to be happy—look up. The scorn and contempt of the proud will serve us well, if thereby we are made to lift our eyes from them to God. People walk the way they look. Let us keep our eyes on heaven.

PSALM CXXIV
Second Deliverance Psalm

2 If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, when men rose up against us, 3. Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us. 4. Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul. 7. Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped.

"THE WATERS HAD OVERWHELMED US."

All the "Deliverance Psalms" will never be published. Sea and soil alike are filled with material for their working, and daily, yes hourly, answered prayer would make another CXXIV. Psalm. If men rise up against the children of God, God will arise in his strength to help his own. For "Israel" in the Palm, many a saved soul could substitute his own name.

"The Lovely Pictures"

O Fall the lovely pictures, to your silken skirt sewn
You ask us which is loveliest, we know with good intent.
While of the ten in number, 'tis hard for us to tell
Though some may think it easy and can do it very well

The lovely panels "Innocence," "The Mother and her Child,"
Have a look of tender beauty, that is delicate and mild

While the "Gossips" and "The Evening Time," have both a place somewhere,
And good companions are they for "Starting to the Fair."

The beautiful "Two Families" should be most true to life,
They drive away from every mind the very thought of strife.

And then "The Arab Warriors" is rare and fine indeed,
Like Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," it truly paints each steed.

The wonderful "Chrysanthemums" appeal so much to me,
I almost feel that I should say, they are my choice to be.

But I have found another, "The Lost Sheep in the Storm,"
A picture, touching, beautiful in every part and form.

We grieve for those snow-driven beasts so helplessly in need.
Their woes must surely find a place in every heart indeed,

For sure the picture teaches the lesson of the Cross,
And the way of safety for the soul from an eternal loss.

Some of the Master's chosen who've wandered far astray
Are caught by bitter tempests and cannot find their way,

But the Cross is there to guide them and they are homeward bound,
The angels sing rejoicing because the lost are found.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A. P., St. John, N. B., writes:

I was in great distress of mind over a lost opportunity. I felt I could not go on with my life. I lost interest in my studies, in everything around me; all I could think of was this one terrible regret. Every chance I could get I prayed, although it seemed a hopeless thing. The darkest day of all, when I was in a state of despair, the answer came.

J. E. M., N. Dak., writes:

I have had answer to prayer in regard to a wayward son.

R. Y. R., Holyoke, Mass., writes:

I asked the dear Lord for a new heart and a right spirit, and he has answered, and filled me with his love, and done abundantly above all that I thought or asked.

I. H. N., Decatur, Texas, writes:

My first direct answer came when I was nine years old; and the answers have been coming all these years. I am now in middle life. When only eighteen, I began to pray daily for the conversion of my young associates; all of them have come to Christ.

A King's Daughter, West Derry, N. H., writes:

I have been praying that a dear friend would give his heart to Christ. The prayer is answered.

Mrs. L. J. L., Ansonville, N. C., writes:

I had a very hard task to perform; I took it to God in prayer, and he helped me.

A. R. H., Niles, Mich., writes:

The Lord has heard me, and my husband, for whom I've prayed for more than twenty years, now asks God daily to guide him through the rest of his life.

I. L. S., Washington, D. C., writes:

We were under quarantine, and a dear one was low. I cried unto the Lord to help us and to spare the dear one and give me strength to endure. Almost immediately a friend who had had the dread disease, came to our aid; and soon, he said, "The worst is over." God spared the dear one, and brought us all out of the fiery furnace of affliction as strong as we went in.

J. G. M., Castleton, Ills., writes:

One day, when all was very dark I happened to pick up THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and saw "Answered Prayers." After reading, I was much encouraged. That night as I prayed, something seemed to tell me not to be afraid, but trust; that God was going to hear me and save my dear one. Although many other dark days came I felt that I need not worry. It is well with our loved one now. God brought her back to us.

S. E., New Kensington, Pa., writes:

It has been my comfort to take all my trials, even the small, everyday affairs, to my Father in heaven, as I have received help as in large issues of life. Only last week I received an answer to a prayer that I have been making constantly for almost a year.

Rose Tift, Kalamazoo, Mich., writes:

My burden seemed too great to bear,
I took it to the Lord in prayer.
Free from the gracious answer came—
All glory to the Father's name!

C. T., Citronelle, Ala., writes:

I have found that God not only answers prayer regarding what seems to be important matters, but in the little things pertaining to our daily lives. I am naturally afraid of thunder and lightning. Last night I was alone during a terrible storm. I prayed to be kept from fear and nervousness, and the prayer was answered.

R. T. H., York, Neb., writes:

My soul was full of doubts and darkness. I prayed to God and he gave me light.

DON'T be confused by all this talk about White Lead chalking, for this is one of its most desirable properties. Pure White Lead properly applied will not crack, peel or scale, but when it fails will do so gradually from outside wear.

It will protect whatever it is applied to as long as a vestige of the paint remains, and does not require to be scraped or burned off when repainting becomes necessary.

The Concert Roller Organ

has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a ve much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which ha been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on applicatio

Giving Up Their Heathen Temples

CHINESE WON BY CHRISTIAN KINDNESS—AID SENT TO THE KWANGSI PROVINCE SUFFERERS

HINA is a land of vast areas, and one in which everything moves slowly. When the wave of famine and pestilence rolled over the empire, in the wake of the Boxer rebellion, it began in northern provinces, and gradually spread east, west, th. A whole year or more it raged in the provinces Shansi and Shensi, making havoc among the popula- n. Then it was felt with great severity along the ley of the river Yangtse-Kiang, from Shanghai west- rd.

n the relief work which was instituted and conducted China during the famine at the time, the readers of IE CHRISTIAN HERALD took an active and promi- nt part. Their generous aid, warded to the Missionary Com- ttee through this journal, was the ans of saving thousands of lives Shensi, Shansi, Pe-chi-li, Shan- ng, Kiangsu, and other prov- es, especially in the two first med.

Now the news comes, through table dispatch to the State De- rtment in Washington, that the nine, still traveling slowly ıthward, has reached the prov- e of Kwangsi. Hon. Robert -Wade, United States Consul Canton (about one hundred les from the borders of Kwang- recently telegraphed to the epartment, saying that starving rents were killing their chil- en, and asking aid in behalf the people. The Editor of IE CHRISTIAN HERALD made quiry of the State Department, nich gave assurances of the nuineness of the case presented Consul McWade. For the pur- se of obtaining still further in rmation, a cablegram of inquiry s sent by THE CHRISTIAN ERALD to the Consul, which omptly brought the following swer by cable:

CANTON, May 5.

HRISTIAN HERALD, New York:

One hundred and fifty thousand rving Kwangsi district, in area of ree hundred miles. Famine in- easing. American help urgently sought. Relief will be properly tributed by American and English ssionaries through me.

[Signed] McWADE.

Immediately on the receipt of this message, the sum five thousand dollars was sent by THE CHRISTIAN ERALD to the State Department at Washington, to forwarded by cable to Consul McWade, and ap- ed in the relief work. Hon. Francis B. Loomis, As- tant Secretary of State, replied as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 7, 1903.

Louis Klopsch, Esq., Editor The Christian Herald:—I am receipt of your esteemed favor of May 6, enclosing certi- d check for $5,000, payable to the order of the Secretary of ate, for the relief of famine sufferers in the province of vangsi, China. I beg leave to thank you for this hand- ne and timely contribution, and I have pleasure in saying that I have to-day cabled the Consul-General, Mr. McWade, at Canton, instructions to draw on the Department of State at sight for the full amount of the contribution. Our Consul-General at Canton will be further instructed to report the details of the situation, and to account for his disbursement of the relief funds.

From another section of China, where, a little over a year ago, the famine raged in all its intensity, we have news of a different and more cheerful character. The Rev. Z. Charles Beals, American missionary in Wuhu, writes as follows, concerning the Gospel work there:

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Your welcome letter of December 22 to hand yesterday. Many, many thanks for it and for the check. After looking over the needs of the field I decided it was most needed in the Bible school. I had two or three young men who were in need, so this amount will keep two of them in the school, paying all expenses for three months. These two are very happy because THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent them the money for their expenses.

The Lord has blessed us wonderfully the past year. When we reached here a little over a year ago, we were confronted with the flood refugees and no church buildings, but now we are well provided for in that line.

This province of An-Way has been opened to the Gospel for over thirty years, and to-day we have about fifty missionaries working in it. Wuhu is the only treaty port in the province. We have counted as many as twenty-five great ocean steamships here loading with rice at one time. This province produces more rice than any other two provinces in China. Wuhu is also the headquarters for all the missionary societies working in this province. Supplies are received here and forwarded into the interior by native house-boats. The population of the province is estimated at 30,000,000, and there are sixty-eight large walled cities. This gives each missionary a parish of 600,000 each for his own!

When we returned to China at the close of the year 1901, we found the refugees of the great Yang tse flood crowded into Wuhu and dying with hunger. I was soon elected on the Relief Committee, to distribute THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other relief moneys. Some special funds were sent to me direct, and these I used in leveling off our lot and building a church, using the most needy of the refugees. We had about two hundred men to work three months completing our church before the refugees returned home. This church was dedicated to the worship of God on June 28, 1902. We had an old temple given us at the same time. This we moved up to the rear of the church, and use it now for our Bible school.

We followed up the refugees across the mighty Yang tse, after they left Wuhu, and soon we secured a Mission house in Chao Hsien, a very ante-foreign city, about fifty miles north of Wuhu and in the flooded belt. The Lord has broken down the opposition to the Gospel through the liberality of the foreigners in distributing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund among them, so that this past year they gave us a hearty welcome. The people flocked in to our meetings, and among them many of the refugees, who were awakened at Wuhu, now came out fully for the Lord. To-day we have there a church membership of thirty-five. Only think, a year ago, these same people were bowing down to wood and stone! Besides the members, we have as many more who are preparing for baptism, and more are inquiring the way.

This congregation is praying for a church to accommodate the people who are coming to hear the Gospel. They are poor and cannot raise all of it, but they say they can give half if I can raise the other half. I was only too glad to see this spirit, and I want to encourage it by trying to raise for them the amount needed. Some friend of your readers are led to give for this noble work, please let them send it to your care. I would like to see a church there as large as our Wuhu church.

TEACHERS AND STUDENTS IN FRONT OF THE BIBLE SCHOOL, WUHU, CHINA

We have now a circuit of about 150 miles, with four stations, and a membership of 84. We have baptized 50 the past year, and we hope for greater things this year. We generally go on our journeys in a Chinese house-boat on the Yang tse and Chao Rivers. The Chao empties into the Yang tse at Wuhu. It is a small river and has no steamers, but the scenery is very pleasing to the eye. Many pretty pagodas are dotted here and there along its banks. The river is always crowded with boats.

Let me urge upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers the importance of mission work in this great province. The fields are white and ready for the harvest, but the laborers are few. Pray that God may send us many more workers here, and help us push the work far into the interior of this mighty empire.

LIFE'S CENTRAL FACT

A Sermon by REV. R. J. CAMPBELL

Of the City Temple, London

ROMANS 8: 38, 39—I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus

OUR text is by no means to be regarded as an abstract statement of the apostle's creed. The apostle is here not speaking in the exact language of the schools, he is speaking with the impulse of the saint. His imagination has carried him away. He offers God a noble hymn of praise, which is at the same time an act of faith; and all that he means to say when all is done is that the love of God is the ultimate fact in the universe, and that nothing exists of sufficient potency to overcome the purposes of his all-conquering love.

What exactly do we mean by the governing fact in the world of men and things? It were easy to illustrate it from the things which you and I see and hear and do every day. Not many days past, when I was visiting amongst my own people, I came to a home from where the mother had very recently been taken, and, either on the wall or somewhere in the conversation—I forget which—the passage appeared: "What is home without a mother?" and upon my drawing attention to it, one of the members of the bereaved family said, "Yes, indeed, what is home without a mother! Our home has not been the same since mother passed away." Now, whether that home was to be dissolved or no, whether the constituent units of it had ceased to feel their common relation or no, one cannot tell. But this we do know, that the governing fact in the making of that home, or any other, is the idea of motherhood. That is the one fact which controls and explains all else.

To change the figure, we have sometimes heard the expression that in looking for the secret of any particular society or business, or even church, we must look for the personality in the centre. The ultimate question for all at the present day is the question of personality. Even in Christ's Church you cannot be superior to that. Your organizations radiate round a personality or personalities. You are each of you just yourself, and you could be nobody else, and where you try to imitate you fail, unless your imitation be an expression of your inmost self; and the utmost organization can do is to allow personality its opportunity.

The Maker Greater than His Work

How did the apostle arrive at the conclusion which he has given us in this sublime hymn of praise? How would you arrive at it if you had to enunciate your faith in the same fact? If you had to tell anybody, in this strenuous, materialistic age of ours, that you are perfectly convinced what the ultimate fact in the universal world of God is, just how would you begin? Well, we might begin by pointing out everything gracious, and beautiful, and good, in human nature itself, and we say the Maker of that must be better than that. All that is gracious, all that is beautiful, all that is good, is but a fleeting expression of an eternal fact, the graciousness, and the beauty, and the love, and the nature of God. We could say that every little flower that grows in the field is an expression of the great beauty idea that is reigning somewhere. Every ray of light that is helping to illumine a darkened world is an evidence that the sun is shining somewhere. Every beautiful note that comes from the instrument which has led our praises is an evidence that once in the mind and the heart of a great composer, a thought of harmony was present. It has become part of the experience which has informed your mind and thrilled your heart. You can say these things speak of something which is greater than these, as much greater than these as the heaven is greater than the earth, as eternity is greater than time. The ultimate fact of the universe must be greater than these fleeting expressions of the fact. The fleeting expressions that are here mean something; and you and I find it easier to believe in God because these things are to be found in the lives and consciences of men.

A Self-Limited Life

Amongst the audience may be some who know what it is to be limited for the sake of a great moral ideal. Look at this man's life—I will not say whose life—full of fair promise, and he has done nothing to blame himself for determining to forfeit it. He was sent to college, and he expected to carve out for himself a future amongst men, to take his place amongst men of thought, of light and leading. He was qualified so to do, and anxious parents prepared the way, as well as anxious parents might. But the day came when the head of the house was taken from him. He had no longer the father's hand to guide, no longer the father's purse from which he might provide for himself whilst studying; and like the brave young man he was, he said—Rather than go on, rather than take an advantage at the cost of some weaker than myself, I will forego the future, I will put by the opportunity, and will enter into business, and carve my way there for the sake of the brothers and sisters left to my charge. Deliberate limitation! That young man found his reward. If he were asked whether, if he could go back over the years of his life, would he do differently, we know he would not. He has become greater by becoming less.

My brother, whether you know it, and see it, and realize it or not, there are some who find it easier to believe in the goodness of God and in the love of the Father, because you became a father to your own mother, and a husband to your own sisters. Oh, yes, this church could show many such cases, I doubt not. Who shall penetrate the secrets of the heart? To-day you know some of you what it is to sorrow for those who have been going down instead of up, those who are sinning unto their own destruction, sinning, it may be, to your deep and never-ceasing sorrow. You know what it is to wrestle with principalities and powers; you know what it is to wrestle with sin incarnate in human flesh, with the sin of the loved one, too. You have been placing yourself upon the altar of sacrifice day by day for the good of another, and you are making it easier for us to think of the love of God in this melancholy, pessimistic age. We need some such testimony as this drawn from the deepest recesses of the human heart to convince us that reigning and shining somewhere in the darkened night, is the love of God as the governing fact of life.

REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, M.A.
Successor of the late Dr. Joseph Parker

But the greatest and the highest evidence of all, and that which the apostle would here deduce, is not drawn from human nature at all, or, at least, not from human nature as you and I know it. Do you know why it is that men think so kindly concerning human nature? It is because 1900 years ago there came a message to the world in the guise of a little Child born in a stable, cradled in a manger, who lived a life of suffering and want amongst men, who died in shame and agony upon the cross, and because a few men became convinced that in that life they had seen the goodness of the Godhead bodily, there has been so much graciousness and kindness and tenderness.

Paul became convinced, or was convinced, to be more exact, that the same Jesus who lay in the manger at Bethlehem, the same Jesus who took the little ones up in his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them, the same Jesus who sat upon the well at Samaria and conversed with that woman of bad character who had never been spoken to before in the name of the Lord of Hosts in accents of tenderness; the same Jesus who raised Lazarus, who went about doing good, who healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, raised the dead; the same Jesus who stood in Pilate's hall in a majesty that could suffer shame and remain majesty still; that same Jesus is seated upon the throne of the universe; that same Jesus came into the life of the Apostle Paul, who was committing men and women to prison and destruction in the name of the righteousness of God, and so transformed him that he went forth to save in the name of the love of Christ; that same Jesus which transformed Paul the persecutor to Paul the saint, persuaded him that nothing in earth or heaven could separate from the love of God the children of his heart.

That same Jesus is very near to you and me, and we are speaking in his name. He was born in lowline he lived in limitation and poverty, he died in agony a shame. But that same Jesus is reigning, remem that. Think what it means, the Saviourhood of Chri his sovereignty is the key of the universe. He is M ter of all, and he has never ceased to be Master; sceptre is in his hand. Nothing can separate us fr the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

And now, dear brethren, not to keep you too long on the subject engaging our thought—it is the sum a substance of all Christian experience everywhere; me bring it to a swift application. With all reveren I venture to address myself to the different types of perience which must be here present.

The Youthful Outlook

How do the young look at life with the fact of G present in conscience and in heart? You look at it w hope, do you not? You think to-morrow will be brigh than to-day, that the world has yet to show you som thing more beautiful than has been the case with you the past. You are quite right, you feel power with you, and you want to live out to the extent of the pow God has given you. You can regard the world as place of great possibilities and of gladness; and you young. Close beside you in the pew there sits an man who once thought the same about it as you. H thinks a little differently now; he is not so sure abo to-morrow. Life has not kept all her promises. L has dealt very differently with him from what he su posed in the heyday of youth, as you are now; and has made great mistakes, as he looks back upon t past. He once in high hopes stepped forth to tre life's pathway, and fight the battle, as you do now; a he comes to expect less from the world and less fr human nature as he grows older. He makes less pro ises to God, but he breathes more prayers, he attac fewer problems, and asks God to hold the helm that may be still. And how should you, with him, interp this beautiful promise—for promise it is—so that it m become a living experience to you both?

The Cheering Assurance

In the first place, when we come to God in the nam of Jesus Christ we take upon ourselves a solemn respo sibility, but at the same time we do it by virtue of act of faith, which leaves very little for our own reso tion to do. Jesus Christ and him crucified, remember, our watchword, our incentive, our comfort, our con dence for the time that is upon us. I would put bound to the Saviourhood of Christ. There is nothi not even your own failures, or your own unfaith, that c separate you from the love of God, which is in Chr Jesus our Lord. Think of him as summoning you.

Jesus! the name that charms our fear,
That bids our sorrow cease,
'Tis music in the sinner's ear,
'Tis life, and health, and peace.

Then look all round life, and tremble not, nor be afra That same Jesus, meek and lowly One, has not change His name is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ev

Now, struggling ones, listen to me. There are m here battling with questions of sin and its con quences. I will begin with the man who is so low do at the foot of the Cross, that he dare not raise his eye and he takes an aspect, a corner of salvation, and hesitates to ask for more. Listen to me. You lo back upon your life with certain misgivings in yo heart, and you fear lest there should be some thin Christ cannot do. There is nothing Christ cannot c There are no desirable things in the whole total rou of human life, for which Christ will show himself insu ficient. Nothing can separate, not even the total your past guilt, nor the burden of your present co science, can separate between you and the Saviourho of Jesus Christ. Listen, you who have been down the depths of infamy. God has not changed since t promise was given. "Herein is love, not that we lov God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be t propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but al for the sins of the whole world."

Every day is a fresh beginning;
Every morning is the world made new,
You who are weary of sorrow and sin,
Here is a beautiful hope for you,
A hope for me and a hope for you.
All the past things are past and over;
The tasks are done and the tears are shed;
Yesterday's errors, let yesterday cover;
Yesterday's wounds, which smarted and bled,
Are healed with the healing that God has shed.
Let them go every one. You cannot relieve them,
Cannot undo, and cannot atone.
God in his mercy forgive and receive them,
Only the new days are our own;
To-day is ours, and to-day alone.

That which hath been is over, as though it had nev been. This is Christ's opportunity for salvation.

MUMMERY IN SAN SALVADOR

IDOLATRY AND . . . . . SUPERSTITION

the little Republic of San Salvador —the smallest in Central America — there are really only two seasons in the year.

R. H. BENDER

Summer has the dry season, beginning in November and lasting until May, and winter has the rainy season, which is the most pleasant time of the year, since the rain falls at ht and the atmosphere is cool and asant, with bright sunshine by day. asionally, during the wet season, re comes a "temporal," or week or two drizzling rain, which often causes ch damage.

f a stranger were to arrive in San vador any Friday during Lent, and nain through Holy Week, he or she uld say with the Apostle Paul, "I perve that in all things ye are too superious." Every Friday during Lent, the age of the Saviour and a cross are taken on parade. Behind it hundreds of men follow with lighted candles, and iting Aves. Along the street are altars h flowers, and candles, and images, l pictures of saints. Here the parade ps, and kneels, while the priest recites l chants in Latin, and the people reond.

This is the principal image in the prosion on Good Friday, as it represents our Lord on his way to Calvary, carrying his cross. Following this procession is the image of the Virgin, the first of the group of three images and dressed in silk and satin. The other two represent the Apostle John and the sorrowful mother. Following these are little girls dressed in white, with wings attached, to represent angels. Priests as well as people follow in the procession. All work and traffic cease during Good Friday, indeed, in some places no one is allowed to mount a beast from Thursday noon until Saturday.

These people are little better than pagans. They have as many gods about as the Chinese for different things. Not long ago the bishop celebrated mass to a certain god or saint, invoking protection against fire; yet in less than a month several buildings were devoured by the flames. So it is with sickness, rains, etc., they have certain saints to whom they pray in such cases. All other religions than that of Rome were excluded until the seventies, when liberty of worship was decreed in San Salvador. In 1896, Rev. S. A. Purdie was the first missionary to commence a Protestant mission among these people. The writer came here in April, 1897, to continue the work to which Mr. Purdie was called, and laid down on August 6, 1897. We have three outstations to look after, besides the work at headquarters. We need consecrated men and women and a new mission building. We have a building fund already started, and hope that some of God's stewards will come to our help. The Central American Mission is represented here by the writer, and Mrs. Bender and Miss Martha Hoffman—altogether too few for this million or more of souls.

ROBERT H. BENDER.

San Salvador, C. A.

The city of San Salvador, the capital of the little Central American republic, was founded in 1528. It is in the centre of a volcanic district and has several times been very badly shaken by earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. It has a population of about 16,000.

Salvador lies between Honduras and Guatemala, and borders on the Pacific Ocean for a distance of one hundred and sixty miles. According to recent estimates, the total population of the republic is between six and seven hundred thousand, the bulk of it being aboriginal or mixed races. There are about ten thousand whites, the descendants of Europeans, in the republic. Most of the natives live by agriculture, their methods of tilling the soil being rather primitive in many places. The climate of the republic is mild and quite pleasant, being tempered by the sea breezes. Catholicism is the state religion, though other creeds are granted toleration. There are very few Protestant missions in the country. That of the Central American Mission, mentioned in our correspondent's letter, is one of the most zealous and energetic. Salvador has been independent of Spanish rule since 1842, and its present constitution was framed in 1855.

IFE'S CENTRAL FACT

ken and a contrite heart God will not despise. The oss of Calvary reaches down to you and to me, and message of love comes into our experience, and nsforms the whole. Nothing in heaven or earth can arate us from the love of God which is in Christ us our Lord.

Then there are some who seem as though when they ve surrendered their life to Christ, they have not ne the things they ought to have done, and they feel y too poignantly that sin has not done with them. member, that very often humiliation, under the ects of sin, becomes a fresh temptation of the adver- y to keep us back from Christ. Nothing must sepae. Some of you may know what I mean when I tell u that, outwardly, though all seems right, you know at it is to fight the battle with the heart that is thin you. Outwardly, though all seems well, you can member, in shame and contrition of heart, times and asons when you have been defeated. It may be you sometimes tempted to pass judgment upon some aker brother, but you remember that hour of weakss. You would like it blotted out of recollection at God has disowned, and his grace made of none ect. You know the arm of flesh has failed you, and u dare not trust your own.

The Keeping Power

The most unlikely things are happening in this great y. Men are trying, but they are afraid the victory of day means no immunity from the further conflict of morrow. "Christ has saved," they say, they feel, t they dread what may be in the days to come, so ten they have failed him. Listen. He is sufficient, t only to save, he is sufficient to cleanse, the love of od does not stop short at the threshold of nature. aviourhood, of course, goes to the inward parts, and the oly Spirit, with his hand upon our heart, is doing the eansing day by day. It is not you who fight the battle, is Christ who overcomes with you and for you. The invelling Christ is part of the great scheme of redemption. One Sunday night, as I was preaching in my own ace, I had finished the sermon, as I thought, with the eclaration of the sufficiency of Christ. I had closed e sermon, and had passed down to the vestry, when plain working man followed me in. He said: "Did u finish your sermon just now?" I said, "Yes, think so; I meant to." "I think," he said, "there something you did not say. You spoke about the rgiveness of sins, and the sufficiency of Christ, and e love of God in redemption; but there is something se you did not say, and it is a part I never like to be ft out." I said, "What is it?" "Why," he said, ears ago, I was brought to Christ; and a terrible ad I took to him. I placed it down at the Cross, and I thought all was right. But the next morning my skies were gray. The next day I was beaten in the Valley of Humiliation fighting with Apollyon. He won. My temptation was too strong, I failed, and I fell; and I failed again, till everybody ceased to believe in me, and I ceased to believe in myself, and held myself in contempt. At last, one day, in desperation, I raised my hands to heaven and said, 'Lord Jesus, I claim thy promise, I claim thy power, look at me to-night.'" The man, continuing, said, "For five years he has kept me as I am, and I am amongst the living to praise him. Preach, I beseech you, next time you approach this subject, preach that Christ is able to save to the uttermost. The Saviour can battle with temptation, and make us sufficient, every time, the assault comes to win the victory for the glory of God."

Brethren, you may be perfectly sure I shall never forget to say it after that. Nothing can separate us from the love of God; no, not even the demon within; nothing can separate us from the love of Christ; no, not the whisperings of the evil nature that would lure us to destruction and undo the work of Saviourhood of the great Master. Nothing can separate us from the love of Christ, internal, external, in earth, or heaven, or hell, nothing can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

There may be some here present who would wish to give other expression to this beautiful truth. There are some for whom the skies will never clear. There are times when they feel that the sun should not shine and the birds should not sing. Christian life is a way of joy. Everyone knows it is a way of sorrow, too. Our Saviour's parting word of peace was accompanied with the declaration: "In the world ye shall have tribulation." But one does not need to go far in human experience for proof of that. One can see it in the lines of the faces of some here present, lines placed there by the hand of carking care. One knows it in the earthquake shocks that come to us every now and then, shocks of the surprises of fortune. None can tell what to-morrow will bring forth. It may be a weary effort. We would wish God would take away the frowning clouds and show us only the sunshine of his glory, and assure us ever of the fair light of his love. God will not always do that, for his ways are not as our ways. They are better, and full of wisdom.

Sorrow's Discipline

In our best moments we would not have life much other than it is. No man worth much wishes always to walk in the sunshine, and to avoid the darksome ways and rough places in life. We feel that all nobleness has its root in that mystery of which we see the likeness in the Garden of Gethsemane and in the scourging of Pilate's hall—a strange paradox not to be explained, but to be felt and to be understood. Such sorrow and such joy do not drive each other out. They live in the same breast; and we are more than conquerers through Him that loved us. Beloved, never seek to travel in other ways than God's ways. You are near to the love of God, surrounded by it, curtained by it; we are hidden as in a mighty rock; nothing can separate us from the great fact which controls all else. We can see things just as they are. We have looked, as it seems, right into the heart of God when we have looked upon the face of Jesus. Paul knew him; the knowledge transformed his life and he became the apostle of the Gentiles. We have known him, and we feel that the name of Jesus has had power over everything that had power to torment us before. We can trust him, and wait for him until the day breaks and the shadows flee away. "Nothing shall separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

A Blessed Awakening

It happened in 1901—if I may introduce a personal illustration—that my only child fell ill, and for a time, as it seemed, dangerously ill. One day she fell into a troubled sleep, in which it was evident that her dreams were disquiet. She tossed about and cried aloud. Her mother bent over her, touched her, and she awoke. The eyes of the little sufferer opened. She looked up at her mother's face, and oh! what a change passed over her own, and she said, "Oh, mother dear, I have been dreaming such dreadful things. I dreamt that I was far away in a dark place, and that I called and called, and you could not hear, and did not answer. And then you touched me and I opened my eyes, and there you were." The language of the child reminded me of the language of a saint, one of the greatest that ever lived, in a prayer addressed to the King of kings and Lord of lords: "We sleep, O, our Father, on thy tender and paternal bosom, and in our sleep we sometimes dream that all is wrong, only to wake and find that all is right." "Nothing can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

"Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, my way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God? Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? There is no searching of his understanding. He giveth power to the faint, he increaseth strength. Even the youths shall faint and be weary; and the young men shall utterly fall. But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as eagles: they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint."

TAKING BREAD INTO A PEASANT'S HUT

WE MAKE AN EFFORT TO USE SNOW-SHOES

THE FIRST FAMINE SUFFERERS WE MET

IN THE FAMINE HOMES OF FINLAND

By DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH

II — At Idensalmi

FAMINE is always a sad condition. To be partially deprived of food is very trying; but with no food on hand, and with no prospect of timely relief, life is dreadful —especially so when children are pleading for something to eat, and infants vainly endeavoring to extract comfort from bosoms parched from want of nourishment. Optimism pales at the sights that confront it, and the most hopeful observer staggers at the intricacies of the problem which widespread famine presents.

Take a single thousand debilitated people, absolutely destitute. What gigantic arrangements are necessary to minister to their various needs, even though, like in India, they be all gathered together in a convenient place! Then think of forty thousand families scattered over fifty thousand square miles, with twenty inches of snow on the ground, some of these families almost inaccessibly located on the hills, others in the valleys, in houses two, three, five, and even ten miles apart, and who can have an intelligent conception of the immense relief operations necessary to meet the requirements of so great a multitude, spread over so vast a territory!

Traveling Day and Night

To search out these unfortunates, to inquire into their condition, to ascertain the degree of efficiency of relief operations, to bring to them the love and practical sympathy of the great-hearted American people thousands of miles away, to study the situation, so that intelligent suggestions might be made for more effective work; all this represented the task we had undertaken, and for which we left home, family and business, and had then already traveled 5,000 miles and were about to travel further, regardless of personal risk and discomfort.

Traveling all night and nearly all morning after we left Helsingfors, brought us to Kuopio, the capital city of the province of the same name. Stepping out on the platform, we were hailed by a well dressed man with the startling inquiry: "How is Stephen Merritt? Is he still alive—still busy saving souls?"

Stephen Merritt, I am proud to say, is my father-in-law, but I must admit that this inquiry concerning his welfare, thousands of miles from home, somewhat staggered me. I replied that, thank God, he was still alive and as zealous as ever in the Lord's work. I then learned that the inquirer was P. A. Malm, mechanical engineer on the Suomi railroad, who had been greatly blessed three years ago under Mr. Merritt's ministry.

At Alapitka, 600 kilometres from Helsingfors, we met with the first specimens of famine sufferers. There at the station we found a man, his wife, a child in arms, a girl of five and a boy of eleven, the latter dreadfully ulcerated around the throat, the result of woful impoverishment of blood, and the whole family clad in tatters. They had walked eighteen miles over pathless snow-fields, in the hope of getting enough food to keep body and soul together, and presented a very pitiful appearance. We ministered to their immediate wants, and for further assistance referred them to the local Relief Committee.

The next stop was at Idensalmi, the last station on the road. Thenceforth the trip would have to be made by sledges. Here Judge Poden's wife told us a sad story of destitution. Four hundred children traveled the streets of this village daily, begging bread from house to house. They were children, who had come from a distance to attend school, absolutely destitute of food, and many without shoes and stockings. She plead with me to appeal to the Committee at Helsingfors to send supplies immediately, and at her request I signed an appeal to that effect, which later on was granted. Dr. Rosendal, the provincial physician at Idensalmi, reported that hunger typhus existed, and that among the children an epidemic of measles had broken out, resulting in a mortality exceeding eight hundred.

After this interview we drove to the Probst, or dean, of Idensalmi. On the way, making a sudden turn, the sledge upset, and the driver and the writer were thrown out, resulting in a wrenching of my left shoulder, which made it impossible for me to get into my furs without assistance during the balance of the journey. The Probst—a man of seventy-two years—talked very conservatively, principally to conceal the fact that every day he was feeding, in his own kitchen, from thirty to one hundred destitute people. While it was a great tax, he had not the heart to turn them away, and very unwillingly did he tell us of what he was doing. His home was so scrupulously clean that everything looked as though it had just been polished. Satisfied that our mission was not of a political nature, he became more communicative, and volunteered the information that his parish included 24,000 souls, of whom at least 5,000 were absolutely dependent on charity, and that unless help continued, death must reap a large harvest. He said that his estimate was a low one, as he did not wish to overstate the number of destitute people; but he was heartily glad we were there to see for ourselves.

A FINNISH HOME, WHERE HUNGER HELD SWAY

At Idensalmi we experimented somewhat with snow-shoes. If we could get accustomed to their use, it would greatly facilitate our reaching homes which otherwise might prove inaccessible. We practised half an hour, and at the conclusion of our efforts all we could say was that we had not fallen, nor had we made any progress. We must have been very awkward, for we completely failed in our attempts, although children as young as five glided by us with the swiftness of a bird. Darkness having set in, we gave it up for once and for all.

Enthusiastic Serenaders

At six in the morning, the world about us suddenly became musical. Some young farmers of the neighborhood had recently united and had formed a brass band. They wished to express their thanks to their American friends for what was being done for the poor of their country, and as they lacked eloquence, they substituted a generous portion of the best music at their command. They came rather early, it is true, but as they had heard that we were to depart immediately after breakfast, they made sure of reaching us in good season.

From Idensalmi we traveled thirty-two kilometres (about twenty-two miles) by sledge to the post-house at Hirvijarvi, stopping here and there on the way, to visit the cottages within sight from the road. Extreme poverty was everywhere prevalent. Most of the people visited belonged to the class known as tenant farmers. They lease the land on which their cottages are erected, and pay the yearly rental in ten, twenty or thirty, or more, days' work—on the farm of the owner. As a rule, they ply a trade in addition to caring for their own garden, and thus, in prosperous times, eke out a comfortable existence. At a cobbler's home we found an old lady of seventy, sick with fever and four little children. The mother was out seeking work or food. The furnishings were of the most primitive character, and every piece of any value had already disappeared. Not a loaf of bread in the house, and not a drop of milk or nourishment of any kind visible. The patient could not rise from her bed. The children looked swollen in body and face, distended as the result of eating innutritious and indigestible food.

We inquired into the cause of their poverty. "It's a long story, and it runs back three years," was the response. "That year the summer was too cold to raise a crop; the xt year the sun, shining twenty-two hours lay, was so hot that it burned up everying, and last summer we had snow or rain ery day for two months, and hence had crop at all, and when there are no crops ere is of course no work." The effort d exhausted the patient, but within a inute she had regained sufficient strength add, "But God knows best." In this, as every case, the visitors left bread, and their personal means enough money to le the sufferers over their immediate quirements. Her gratitude knew no ounds, and in language unintelligible to , she prayed for heaven's choicest blessgs upon us and the good people of merica, who were Finland's chief supt now in the darkest hours of her history.

Uncomplaining Sufferers

The Finns are not a complaining peoe and are very reticent about their own fairs. It would never occur to them to ll an outsider that their stock of bread as exhausted, or that they had last week lled their cow, because there was no dder to keep it alive, or that they had long been without meat and vegetables to almost forget the taste of them.

We enter another cottage. It is at urtomaki, about 400 miles from Helsingrs, and 450 miles from St. Petersburg. any years ago a murder was said to ve been committed there, and now it is opularly called "Murder Hill." In a iserable hovel, we find the women and ildren of two families huddled together. n order to reduce expenses and for comany's sake, it often happens that the ives and children of several households father and mother looking at the remains of their beloved dead. Ghastly as the picture appeared to us, so dear it was to him. It reminded him of the beloved one waiting for him at the celestial gates. We stepped over to the bed and looked at it. His eyes were in the same direction. They were wet with tears. We said nothing, but we each felt that to him that picture was sacred.

oin, especially when as in this case the nen are many miles away seeking work, r having found work—as already stated n my last letter—find themselves unable o contribute anything toward the support of their loved ones at home. On ntering, we explained the nature of our isit, but our explanation elicited no enightening response. They were doing well, hey said, as well as their neighbors. "Well, how are the neighbors doing?" we nquired. "Some better, some worse," vas the rather evasive reply. "Have you ny bread in the house?" "Yes, over here." We looked in the direction indicated, and under the ceiling near the oven n the corner, we found suspended on a pole three loaves of dark-brown bread, of poor quality, about ten inches across and three-fourths of an inch thick—their entire stock for two women, two nurslings, and seven other children! They had not tasted meat in seven months and no fish or vegetables for five months. When the cow of one of the two families was killed early in the fall, the supply of milk ceased, and since then, with the exception of the small quantities they could occasionally borrow, they had had none.

A Bereaved Host

At this house we discovered the best way of securing information from Finns concerning their own condition, and it was never to ask them about themselves, but always about their neighbors. They will eloquently plead the neighbors' cause, but they cannot beg for themselves; for with most of them, it is harder to beg than to die.

Early in the afternoon we reached Paisuva, and stopped to rest at a farmhouse. The farmer, a very pious man, gladly received us and made us feel quite at home. He was as hospitable as his means permitted. His house and his table were at our disposal. Lack of sleep and much traveling had made us tired. He took us into his parlor, which also was his bedroom. Lately it had pleased Providence to bereave him. A child of ten had been taken, and over the bed hung a photograph of the dead child on its bier, with

After serving us with delicious coffee (Finns are very fond of this beverage) and home-made cakes, he harnessed up his own horses, in order to give ours a rest, and took us to Assikkainen, to visit the poverty-stricken farmers in that village. After we had relieved the most pressing wants of one family, its head put in an earnest plea for another family absolutely destitute, but too far distant for us to visit if we expected to reach the next town before midnight. We hesitated somewhat about giving him the bread and the marks, but Dr. Reuter assured us that we could safely do so, as the Finns were too honest to wrong anyone, least of all a fellow-sufferer—and Mr. N. J. Hjelman, the banker at Idensalmi, had told us in the morning, that nothwithstanding the destitute condition of the people, not a pound of flour of all the vast supplies that had passed through that centre had ever been lost. So we entrusted the relief to the supplicant and returned to the farmhouse, where coffee and cakes were again served. When about to depart, we asked the farmer how much we owed for refreshment and the use of his horses and his own services, and he told us that we were welcome to all we had had; he only wished he could have served us better.

We arrived at Hirvijarvi at 11 o'clock at night, and took our first dinner of canned goods. We then planned for the morrow, retiring at 1 o'clock, and at 6:30, the door, which, as usual in Finland, was without lock or key, was opened by the maid, who woke us individually, and told us coffee would be served immediately. We arose, dressed, breakfasted on canned goods and coffee, and at 7:30 were ready to start. Our drivers, when they first presented themselves in ordinary clothes, at Idensalmi, were a fierce-looking, forbidding set of men: but when we met them this morning, with their fur coats and fur caps, they looked much pleasanter, and notwithstanding their hard looks, we had no trouble whatever with them throughout the journey. The bill for entertaining our party and providing the coffee, was three marks, or sixty cents. I was inclined, in view of its modest proportions, to add a liberal gratuity, but Dr. Reuter—representing the Committee—rather discouraged giving them more, as he feared that they might be led to look for an equal display of generosity from native travelers, who might not be able to afford it.

After traveling all day in sledges, we arrived at Kajani at 6:30 in the evening, and wiping our feet carefully on the pine branches, which take the place of rugs at the front door of every Finnish country home, we entered the hotel—and a very good one it was—took off our rubbers—everybody wears rubbers here—hung up our furs, and found four rooms neatly furnished, all ready for our occupancy. Our letters had been forwarded to this point, and welcome news they contained—and here, for the first time in a week, intelligence of our families reached us. The tender sentiments in which the letters abounded, together with the affecting scenes we had witnessed during the day, put us in a very mellow frame of mind. I quickly settled down to write a letter to my little daughter Mary, when the strains of song reached my ear.

A host of people had gathered to welcome us, according to Finland's custom, with song and flowers. The latter consisted of a tiny bouquet, but the former was very abundant and very touching. I addressed them in a few words, telling them of the generous-hearted Christian people across the great deep, who, as descendants of Europe, gladly responded to every cry for help from the Mother Land, and cheerfully contributed to the needs of the Old Folks at Home. Professor Reuter, who acted as interpreter, translated my remarks into Finnish. Then we wrote to Pastor Wayrynen, a man of God whose life is devoted to the welfare of the simple people of his parish, requesting him to call at his earliest convenience.

We had not very long to wait, since before we could finish the generous meal provided by the hostess, Pastor Wayrynen made his appearance.

Finnish Meal Customs

A meal in Finland differs greatly from a meal in America. It is specially adapted to the climate, and while very acceptable in Finland, would be impossible in our country. As one enters the dining-room he finds the table set, and on it there is caviar, smoked salmon, bologna, herring, sardines, ham, cheese, pickles and ponderous quantities of unsalted butter and spiced Swedish bread, baked liked pilot bread as to size and crispness. This all constitutes what is generally known there as Smorgasbord, or Bread and Butter table. A stranger not acquainted with Finnish custom would be apt to make a meal of these delicacies, in which case a surprise would await him: for very soon the dishes are removed and a regular course dinner, beginning with soup and ending with dessert, is served in regulation style, the cold dishes having been intended only as an appetizer.

All of the courses are exceedingly rich, pastry being eaten with the soup, and everything else swims in prodigious quantities of fat; but all this is necessary in a climate like that of Finland, where the thermometer frequently falls to 35 degrees below zero, and a fall of 50 degrees in the temperature within a single day is by no means an exceptional occurrence.

In larger hotels, smorgasbord is served on a side table. Each guest, taking a plate, knife and fork, helps himself to whatever best suits his fancy, and then retires to eat, either standing or seated at the table where the dinner proper is to be served. The piety of the Finlanders, and I use this word so as to include both many Finns and those of Swedish descent, is frequently manifest at this time, when, standing erect, with hands clasped and head bowed, many say grace before and frequently after meals, regardless of how many others may be present.

In my next letter we shall travel from Kajani to Uleaborg.

Finland's Famine Over

HERE is the best of good news from Finland! Professor Saltzman, Chairman of the Helsingfors Finnish Central Relief Committee, sends this message by cable:

Helsingfors, May 6.

DR. KLOPSCH, New York:

We now hope our own means will suffice till the next harvest. (Signed) SALTZMAN.

This applies to the entire famine field in Finland, the Central Committee having full jurisdiction in all the affected districts. It means that, with the spring, life and hope have come back again to the farmers and peasants.

It means that our readers' share in the work is ended, and that no more contributions for Finland are needed. All contributions mailed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD after this date will be returned to the senders.

Creed Revision

A PRESS dispatch from the Stated Clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly, contains the record of the votes of the Presbyteries on the questions submitted by last year's General Assembly. It appears that there is more unanimity than was expected. Of the 235 Presbyteries, 227 have voted for the revision of the creed. This is a triumph for the liberals in the church and will be gratifying to the progressive lay members. It will probably lead to the formulation of a shorter creed for general use, which has been demanded by several of the Presbyteries. The conservatives have the consolation of knowing that the revision will not change the doctrines of the church, but only changes the emphasis laid on certain points. The love and tenderness and fatherhood of God are made more conspicuous, and the creed is thus less austere and cold than formerly. That the change will affect the character of the preaching is improbable. The ministers have not felt it incumbent upon them to make the various articles the subject of sermons and they will not do so now. Their preaching has not been at variance with the creed, but it has been less dogmatic and more attractive. The creed will now be more in harmony with the preaching, and probably many will be willing to enter the ministry who were kept from doing so by having to subscribe to articles which did not express their belief in the terms they could approve.

The decisive vote is a sign of the times. We are realizing more and more that the spirit of Christianity is one of love. The Christian, as we now regard him, is not a man who has a set of doctrines logically stated, carefully arranged and neatly labeled in a set of pigeon holes; but a man in whom is the spirit of Christ, which leads him to live a kindly, genial, helpful life. The best proof he can give that he has been converted, is not in his being able to give a correct definition of the doctrine of the Trinity, or to explain predestination and election, but by his disposition. If he is patient, forgiving, merciful, if he loves Christ and tries to imitate his example, if while hating sin he loves the sinner and seeks to win him away from evil to holiness—in such ways he shows that he has the divine nature and has been born again. Experience has shown that an unregenerate man may be strictly orthodox in his beliefs; but it has shown, too, that right conduct is based on right thinking, and therefore the church is wisely vigilant against laxity as much as error in its creed.

Imperfect Likeness

THE reflected image of the sun in the lake is very different from the sun in the heavens. If he cease to shine, as when a cloud passes over his face, the image in the water is lost. If you disturb the smooth surface of the lake, the likeness of the sun will be broken into glimmering fragments. Still that image resembles the sun.

So is it with Christ's likeness in the heart of the believer. If Christ should leave him, it would disappear. And when the heart is troubled by doubt, or fear, or crushing affliction, or conscious sin, how broken the likeness often is! But, whether dimly or brightly appearing, it is likeness to Jesus still.

Be not discouraged, Christian soul, if after years of striving you can see in yourself no semblance to the beautiful image. Let it comfort you to reflect that Jesus may see his likeness where we can hardly discern it at all; just as the portrait of a child will sometimes seem better to a parent's eyes than to a stranger's. There are touches of resemblance which only love can see. Not that this should content us; we ought not to be satisfied with a likeness which only the eye of God can discover. We must aim and seek to be so like Christ that all the world may see the resemblance. That is possible for us all.

Finding Out God

IN a lecture recently delivered before a leading Western university, the speaker, a man distinguished in the scientific world, made some remarkable statements. Among the scientific probabilities of the new century, he included the solution of the question of the soul's immortality, and concerning the existence of a Divine Creator and Ruler, he added:

> At the beginning of the twentieth century such an existence is unknown to mankind in general, however firmly it may be believed by large portions of mankind. But the twentieth century before it ends may be distinguished by the attainment of definite and generally satisfactory evidence, showing whether there is a great Master Hand that sweeps over the whole of this deep harp of life, or whether men are but pipes, through whom the breath of Pan doth blow a momentary music.

This may be the language of one who is actuated by a sincere desire for the truth, but he is heading toward the darkness, rather than the light. All who have trodden that old path of human presumption, have found it end in the same way—in delusion and disappointment. Has the world, then, existed so long without knowing its Maker, that it becomes necessary for our twentieth century scientists to roll back the curtain of His throne, and disclose to the peoples of the earth the Creator and Ruler of the universe? If man be incapable of constructing a telescope that will penetrate the furthest starry depths; if with all his art he cannot decide whether life exists on any of the sister worlds that move around us; if he is even baffled by the mysterious yet familiar phenomena of his own world, with its electric forces and its myriad forms of life and intelligence, what is there to justify his expectation of being able to "find out God"—to discover the Creator, through any of the devices of human skill? "Canst thou by searching find out God?" asked Zophar of Job; "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" From the earliest days down to our own time, all efforts to penetrate the Divine secret, through human channels alone, have been fruitless and disappointing.

Yet not all have been disappointed. In every age, there have lived true and pure souls, that have found out God. They have found Him, not with the eye of Science but of Faith; not with human vision but with the divinely-quickened spiritual perception that comes with a holy trust and a blameless life. They have walked with Him, as Enoch, first of the patriarchs, "walked with God," and have heard His voice, and He has lifted them over the pitfalls, the snares and the rough places and has smoothed all their ways. He has opened His heavens and has dropped down blessing upon them; He has answered their prayers beyond all numbering. They need no scientific demonstration to "find out" what is already to them the greatest and grandest fact of time or eternity. God to such souls is the most veritable reality in the universe, and the source of all inward life and joy and happiness.

Thus, though it be impossible to apprehend the Infinite through finite means, or the spiritual through the material, the great secret that is, denied to the wisest of men, is disclosed to babes—that is, to the simplest. For God reveals himself every day to his dear ones, who come to him in the absolute trust and confidence of a child.

> "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart . . . He hath respect unto the lowly; but the proud he knoweth afar off. . . . Thou compassest my path and my lying down and art acquainted with all my ways . . . whither shall I flee from thy presence. . . . The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth . . . He will hear their cry . . . The Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you. . . . The things of God knoweth no man but the spirit of God. . . . Now we have received not th spirit of the world but the spirit which is of God, that w might know the things that are freely given us. . . . Bu the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of Go for they are foolishness unto him."

Science has always failed—and always will fail—t "find out God," whereas the divine revelation comes t Faith unasked.

One Word Out of the Heart Enough

SOME of us can argue and some of us cannot. Som of us are influenced by argument and some ar not. You may pound a man's mistaken views to atom with sledge-hammers of reasoning, and he is not muc nearer being a Christian than he was before; just a you may pound a cake of ice to pieces and it is pounde ice after all. The mightiest argument is often a simpl appeal to personal experience.

A minister had delivered an elaborate course of le tures in refutation of some form of infidelity, for th special benefit of a certain man who attended hi church. Soon after the man came and declared himse a Christian. The minister was delighted with his su cess, and said to the new believer, "I should be glad t know which of my discourses it was that removed you doubts." The reply was: "Oh, it was not any of you lectures. The thing that set me thinking was, that poor woman came out of the church beside me one da and stumbled on the steps, and I stretched out my han to help her, and she said, 'Thank you.' Then she looke at me and said, 'Do you love Jesus Christ, my blesse Saviour?' And I did not; and I went home and though about it, and now I can say I do love Jesus."

If you have found Christ, and know he is you Saviour, you can say so. Never mind about the how— any how! Only say it. Whether we have any elo quence or not, any logic or not, whether we can speal persuasively and gracefully or not, if we have got hol of Christ at all we can say we have, and it is at ou peril that we do not.

OUR NEW SERIAL

IN our issue of July 1 will appear the opening chap ters of a new and powerful story of modern American life, by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, the well known author of In His Steps. Competent critics have pronounced "The Narrow Gate" the greatest story Dr. Sheldon has ye produced, and unquestionably the strongest, in its por traiture of characters and its vivid dramatic action. We congratulate our readers on the pleasure and profit that await them in this remarkable story, which has an object so high and so excellent, yet not unattainable that it can not fail to prove, in the widest sense, helpful and inspiring.

THE beautiful poem, "The Church and the World," which appeared in the April 29 issue of this journal, is the literary handiwork of the Rev. H. H. White, of Elgin, Ill. It deserves to be known and read through out all Christendom, as it points a lesson and a warning which are greatly needed by the Church to-day. Mr. White's fine poem, simple and graceful in diction and beautiful in imagery, is a spiritual picture that merits a high place in religious literature.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST J. A. DAVIS recently closed a series of highly successful revival meetings in southern New York.

—LONNIE DENNIS, the child Evangelist, has lately been holding services in Denver, Colo., and Salt Lake City, Utah.

—SPECIAL EVANGELISTIC services have been held lately in the Presbyterian Church of Hackettstown, N. J., with good results.

—MR. WESTON R. GATES, of the Peoria Mission, died at Montreal, N. C., several months ago. He was a very successful and earnest Christian worker.

—REV. J. EUGENE SNOOK, missionary of the Presbyterian Church in Manila, writes that the native children are eager to learn the English language. He is collecting a library for a Gospel Launch, which will circulate the books in thirty or more Philippine towns. He will be grateful for any good books sent for the work.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Balkan Disturbances

RIOTS and outrages continue throughout the Macedonian districts and on the Bulgarian frontier. Scenes like that depicted in the accompanying illustration are of daily occurrence. Turkish soldiers halt any man entering Turkish territory from Bulgaria, and search him, to find out if he carries arms. The Turkish authorities contend that Bulgaria not only allows the Macedonian insurgents to shelter within her borders, but actively assists them with arms and money. A vigorous warning was sent by the Sultan to the Bulgarian government last week. The Bulgarian government showed its courage by refusing to receive the document, declaring that it was beneath its dignity to accept a dispatch couched in terms so offensive. It declared that it was acting in good faith, and denied the charges of complicity in the Macedonian movements. There is, nevertheless, a strong opinion throughout Europe that the Sultan's charges are well founded. It is believed, however, that Bulgaria is safe from attack, the Sultan being reluctant to begin a conflict which may involve Austrian or Russian interference. Those Powers, being the protectors of Bulgaria, would come to her rescue if necessary. In the meantime, the Macedonian Committee appears to be determined to provoke such a conflict. On April 30 the town of Salonica was almost destroyed by a series of dynamite outrages, which wrecked banks, postoffices and public buildings. Mines were discovered under the public streets, in which bombs were stored ready for explosion. The policy of the Committee evidently is to provoke a massacre, which will arouse the indignation of Europe. It is clear that the reforms which Turkey is now instituting at the bidding of Austria and Russia have come too late, and that nothing will satisfy the people but final and complete separation from Turkey. The people who know what they have suffered, sympathize with their determination, even though they deplore their methods. The Macedonians know that under Turkish rule there is no hope of permanent peace or liberty for them. They therefore refuse to be beguiled by temporary concessions. One can but wish that the people among ourselves who are in spiritual bondage would show the same determination. Their deliverance would then be assured.

Resist the devil and he will flee from you (James 4:7).

A Magnetic Operation

A physician reports in the current number of a medical journal, a remarkable method of giving relief to a patient. The man was hurt in an explosion, and was placed under treatment. After various wounds had been dressed, he complained of severe pain in one of his eyes. The doctor examined it, and thought that possibly it had been perforated by a piece of steel. No foreign body, however, was visible. A test was made by bringing a large magnet near to the organ. At a distance of two inches the patient complained of a violent disturbance, as if the eye was being rent apart. This left no doubt as to the location and nature of the foreign body. The magnet was again applied, as the patient was able to bear it, and finally a piece of steel, about an eighth of an inch long, protruded itself from the eyeball, and flew to the pole of the magnet. Cleansing and healing applications were administered, and the patient kept in darkness. After ten days of seclusion he had sufficiently recovered to leave the hospital, with the prospect of regaining his normal sight. There is no doubt that the man would have lost his eye but for the use of this strange power, about which we know so little. We cannot explain the force that could draw the steel from the eye, but the fact of its existence was proved. If men who are afflicted with evil in their natures, would submit to the Holy Spirit's influence, even though they cannot understand it, how many of them might be saved!

The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst thou tell whence it cometh nor whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit (John 3:8).

Imprisoned in a Vault

Two grave-diggers were going to their work in the Holy Name Cemetery, Jersey City, N. J., a few days ago, when they were startled by hearing a shout from one of the vaults. It was scarcely light, the grave they were going to dig being required for an early morning funeral. No one had been around the cemetery before that hour, so the shout from the vault was the more inexplicable. Superstitious fears overcame the men, and they ran to the gate of the cemetery. While they waited there, uncertain what to do, a mounted policeman rode by. They took him into their confidence, and he accompanied them to the vault. He, too, heard a similar cry, and believing that it came from the lips of a living man, he went in search of the cemetery keeper. This officer took his keys and opened the gate of the vault. Inside was a man who had been there all night. He had entered the cemetery before sundown, and being tired had turned into the vault, the door of which stood open, and sat down. He fell asleep, and when he awakened, he found that the door had been shut and locked. He shouted, but there was no response. After a lapse of time that seemed like whole days, he heard the footsteps which proved to be those of the grave-diggers going to their work. He shouted again, and finally, as before stated, obtained release. It must have been a distressing experience for him to spend the night among the dead. It may be hoped that when the time comes for him to be laid in such a place permanently, he may have that faith which will assure him of a joyful resurrection.

Every one who seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day (John 6:40).

Marconi Halts a Vessel

The Minnetonka, of the Atlantic Transportation Line, was beginning her voyage to Europe last week, and was well on her way to the lower bay, when a passenger arrived at the dock. She was well known to the manager of the line, who was as much distressed as the passenger at her being left behind. He immediately summoned a tug, and put her and her luggage on board. The tug started in hot pursuit, but the liner was far ahead and was steadily increasing her speed. The tug blew its whistle, and did everything possible to attract the attention of the pilot and captain of the Minnetonka, but without avail. The manager of the line was beginning to apprehend that the liner would get away, when the suggestion was made to him that he use the wireless apparatus with which she is equipped. The operator at the Marconi station was hunted up, and a message was sent to the vessel, bidding it wait for the pursuing tug. The message was duly received, though the Minnetonka was then below Liberty Island. The vessel was stopped, and the belated passenger taken on board. It was fortunate that a man was at hand to send the message, and one on the ship who could understand it. It happens, in the voyages of a few passing messages are not noticed, and because our ears are not attuned to them.

There are many who are [illegible] the [illegible] way, work or [illegible].

Elusive Property

The sale of an island which has been the subject of litigation for many years has been recorded at Pittsfield, Mass. It was originally part of a farm which ran down to the edge of Onota Lake. During a flood which occurred in 1869, the water cut a deep trench, making the land in question an island. It was about an acre in extent and was heavily wooded. It was noticed that the channel dividing it from the mainland was gradually widening at times, and becoming narrower at other times. Finally it was discovered that the wooded acre was afloat. Some years afterward it drifted away during a storm and settled against the opposite shore. The owner of the property on that shore promptly laid claim to the land which the waters of the lake had brought him. The original owner contested the claim, and while the suit was still undecided, the floating acre drifted away to another part of the lake. Again a suit for ownership was begun, but was ended by another drift. The owner of the property against which it is at present located believes he has found a way of anchoring it, and in order to avoid litigation has purchased it from the original owner. In what way he expects to secure permanent possession of it he has not disclosed. It is a difficult problem, but not so hopeless as is that other struggle, which applies to property of all kinds, and which is so bitter to those whose heart is set on their possessions — the distressing fact that when the last enemy approaches, everything must be abandoned.

For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out (1 Timothy 6:7).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost has been conducting evangelistic meetings in Hongkong at the request of the Protestant clergy.

A shock of earthquake, unprecedented in violence occurred at Ischeschi on Samos (Greek), April 5. The entire population was thrown into a state of great excitement. Only slight damage was done.

Dr. J. Taylor Hamilton, of the Moravian Theological Seminary at Bethlehem, Pa., has been elected member for America of the governing Board of Moravian Missions located at Berthelsdorf, Saxony.

It is proposed that Oct. 5, 1903, which is the two hundredth anniversary of Jonathan Edwards' birth, be adequately celebrated in this country, just as Emerson's centenary is soon to be, and as John Wesley's bi-centenary is to be in June next.

The sixty-ninth annual meeting and anniversary of the American Female Guardian Society and Home for the Friendless, took place at the new home of the society in New York on May 13. Excellent progress was made in all departments of the work during the year.

A Conference of Leaders of Missionary Work in Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies of the Southern States will be held on Lookout Mountain, Tenn., July 4-8. Information may be obtained by addressing Mr. Charles V. Vickrey, 150 Fifth Ave., New York.

The ninth annual Conference for Bible study and consideration of practical methods of Church work will be held at Winona Lake, Indiana, August 30th to 30th. A special invitation is extended to ministers and Christian workers, to Christian educators, to Christian Sunday-school teachers, to Christians generally. Particulars may be obtained by addressing Rev. S. C. Dickey, D.D., Indianapolis, Ind.

Dr. Hirsch, a Jewish Rabbi of Chicago, in the course of a lecture on April 25 said that "If Jesus Christ should appear to the world he would be welcomed in every Jewish synagogue in the land." He added that although modern Jews regard Jesus as one of the noblest spiritual teachers who ever appeared in the world, and believe that the Jews caused him bitter suffering, many Christians do.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will greatly regret to learn that Dr. Sanford, on account of whose illness [illegible] was now totally blind. All hope of restoring his eyesight has been abandoned. The well-known singer, who has spent the greater part of a generation in active Christian service, accepts his affliction with fortitude. "God gives and takes away," he says. "It is God's will."

The Mayflower's Message

By FRANCES A. DOUGHTY

I.

MISS NUTE'S scholars had a May holiday, and they spent it most happily in the woods, hunting the lovely pink and white blossoms of the arbutus, called in their New England home the mayflower.

One class of her girls, ten in number, belonged to the "King's Daughters." They had for the time a genuine enthusiasm for helping other people, and now even wanted to give away the exquisite pleasure they found in a large bed of mayflowers.

The result of the generous impulse was that before night they had tied up twenty-five or thirty small bunches, attached cords to each, with a favorite maxim or quotation, and expressed the floral offering to the President of their Society to dispose of as she might think best in New York. Miss Nute told them the flower was considered very choice there, as it is not found growing in the country near that city.

II.

The streets of New York are very lonely to a person in trouble. Poor little Hetty Harvey walked along wearily on the beautiful May day, the sky blue above her, and the dawning springtime fresh with promise in the air, but her spirit felt as worn and shabby as the walking-suit she had lived in all winter, and she was painfully conscious of not matching the day at all. Only a forlorn remnant of pride prevented her from crying in the street.

"Everybody and everything is against me," she said to herself bitterly, turning her head away as she passed a big store on Fourteenth street. She did not wish any of the shop-girls there to see and recognize her. Some articles were missing from her counter, and she had left there the previous week with circumstances strongly against her, dismissed ostensibly because the force was being cut down. There was no open accusation, but a cold stiffness in the manner of the head-clerk put her pride in arms, so she would not ask for a letter of recommendation to assist her in getting another place. Probably he would have given her one if she had asked him. He would have seen that she felt strong in her own innocence.

She went at once to call on the lady she had sewed for when she first came from Vermont. A strange family was occupying the house, and she was told at the door that the people who used to live there had gone to Europe.

"To Europe!" she echoed, from a great deep of disappointment that you who read this in happy homes cannot fathom. "They might as well be at the bottom of the Dead Sea—sometimes I wish I was there myself!"

Hetty had no home, and she had just money enough left for one night more, another supper and breakfast at the reduced rates of a certain "Working Girls' Home." She had never been brought low enough to ask charity; and had not the means to pay her way back to Vermont to stay with her only relatives—some very distant ones—until she could find work there. She had left them to try her fortune in the great city of New York, where she had heard many more avenues were open than in the rural districts, and the Yankee spirit of independence and progress in this blue-eyed, dimpled maiden could not bear an out-and-out defeat. She looked soft, but she had a certain strength of purpose. She remembered that a family she used to know in Vermont was living in Jersey City. She had seen none of them for years, but surely they would feel enough interest in a fellow-townswoman to help her to find a situation. Perhaps they would ask her to stay with them for a day or two until something "turned up," and every day would make a difference in the present state of her finances.

Acting upon this she took the Elevated road, and was soon at the ferry. After crossing it she went into the first drug store she came to in Jersey City, to consult a directory. Her heart gave a great bound of joy when she found the name she was looking for—"Turbill, Hannah, widow," etc. The street and number were not far from the ferry; she was soon at the house, and, pleased with her luck thus far, rang the bell eagerly.

A gaudily dressed girl came to the door. Hetty knew her at a glance, but was eyed in return without a gleam of recognition. The two had not met since they were children.

"What do you want?" said the young woman—Miss Printhy Turbill—rather curtly, as if impatient at the interruption.

"Mother!" she screamed: "Come out here, somebody wants you,—" and then Miss Printhy took her flight.

Hetty swallowed a feeling of reluctance with one resolute gulp, as a stout, middle-aged woman came waddling out of the dining-room, fastening her dress hurriedly at the waist, as if in the act of making a second toilet. It was evident that after officiating as cook, she was about to act the part of hostess at the dinner-table to that gentleman, "Keeping steady company" with her daughter in the parlor.

"Hello! if this ain't Peter Harvey's girl—I see the likeness."

"Yes—he was my father."

"What be you doin' in New York?"

"Working for my living, Mrs. Turbill.

HETTY THOUGHT ONLY OF THE BLACKNESS BENEATH THE WATER'S BRIGHT SURFACE

"Don't you remember me, Printhy? We used to be scholmates—"

"Land sakes!—as if there wasn't a hull lot of girls who went to school with me, and how in creation am I to keep track of 'em all?"

"Hetty Harvey."

"Why to be sure! I do remember there was a Harvey girl. Her mother used to make real good cookies; she had 'em for lunch"—smiling, and thawing considerably—"Come in, Miss Harvey."

Just at this moment a bell rang at the other end of the hall. Hetty could see the dining-room open and a table spread there, so this bell must be the summons to dinner, an awkward time for her to arrive.

Printhy looked toward the parlor as Hetty stepped over the door-sill, and giggled meaningly.

"I know you'll excuse me; a gentleman is in there—me and him's a keepin' steady company, and I've got to speak to him this very minute. You just wait till I call mother."

You may have heard that I was left an orphan—" then realizing that not a minute was to be lost—"Oh, do tell me if you know of any work I can get to do?" she added, in an eager breath.

As yet she had not been invited to sit down, this civility was merely forgotten. Mrs. Turbill was not a bad-hearted woman, she was only flustered, having something else on her mind.

"No, I haven't heard of no place at all, lately. I hope you ain't given dissatisfaction to your last employers?" (not too hurried to throw in a little cheap advice). "A girl with her way to make in the world hadn't ought to be too particular. Well, we're just up to our eyes in work, a gettin' Printhy ready to be married. It came sort o' sudden like. That's her gentleman in the sittin'-room now, and it's the first time he's come from down East to visit us, and we've got to have him here to dinner. I tell you, Miss Harvey, just you call some other time. I'd ask you to stay over night, but you see he's got the spare room, and Printhy—her room is chuck full of patterns, and dresses, and what with the sewin' machine and her sheets and pillow cases we're a makin', there's hardly room to turn round. You ain't busy now, you say. Come again while you have holiday later in the spring, and we'll talk about the folks down to Vermont, and old times. We calculate to git through this all-fired rush after while, and take a little breathing spell before the weddin'. Goodby, Miss Harvey."

If Mrs. Turbill did not literally close the door in her guest's face, she came very near doing it.

"Good afternoon, Mrs. Turbill."

Hetty set her mouth firmly as she turned her back on that inhospitable door, resolving never to darken it with her shadow again. They should never even hear what became of her if she could prevent it. When she stepped on to the ferry-boat again she lowered her veil, looking under it, away from her fellow-passengers, into the water in the dock. The sun lit it up cheerily, but she thought only of the thick blackness underneath the bright surface, and a voice from way down there seemed to call her:

"If all else fails, rest is here, this is always open to you."

It was a long way from the Cortlandt street ferry to the Working Girls' Home, but Hetty could not afford to ride there. As she walked along one temptation after another came to her. How should she escape the cruel uncertainty of the present, the despair of the near future, when she would find herself without money, without friends in this desolate wilderness of New York. Were there no ways out of this dreadful dilemma?

Yes,—death, and begging,—and some other ways, too, but sinful ways, Hetty had never walked in and scarcely understood.

What if she were to abandon herself recklessly to the current of the hour? It was growing strong, relentless, irresistible.

III.

The dining-room in the Working Girls' Home was in the basement; when supper was ready, Hetty followed the others into it dejectedly.

As they entered the door a delicious perfume filled the air, strong and penetrating, like nothing but the woods in the earliest springtime. Hetty Harvey knew this perfume well, though it had not greeted her for two years.

She took a seat mechanically. A bunch of mayflowers was lying on the plate before her—whose was it? Then looking down the table she saw a similar one on each plate, fresh and delicate, as if gathered this May day.

This bunch then was intended for her. Childhood's early memories, evoked by that woody odor, came rushing back on the swift wings of sense. How often she had gathered the mayflower with her mother and father in their Sunday afternoon walks, or her own solitary rambles. It was her mother's favorite wild flower, and but a few weeks ago she wrote to ask an old neighbor to place a bouquet of it, when it came into bloom, on the lonely graves of her parents in the country cemetery.

All the sacredness of home influences in other and happier days rushed over her in an overwhelming tide. For a few moments she saw no one, took no account of the exclamations of her companions. Her surroundings were the dream, the past became the reality.

Taking up her precious little bouquet, she saw something written on a card attached to it by a narrow ribbon, and read these three words:

"Trust in God!"

She raised the flowers to her lips, and one tear fell softly upon their tender bloom—it may be with such tears as this the immortal flowers in the gardens of

When Dorothy Went Home

THE two women who were watching in the room next the one in which Dorothy Raimond was sleeping that last, quiet slumber which no dreams disturb, glanced uneasily at each other the clock struck twelve. When the last long stroke d away on the air, Mrs. Cranfells shivered and drew little shawl more closely about her thin shoulders. ss Rachel Ann Chittenden, who was plump and come- got up and stirred the fire, shaking down the ashes, opening the draughts.

'I'm goin' to fix us a little supper, Melissy," she said, boil some coffee. You'll be catchin' your death ld!"

"It doos beat all," said Mrs. Cranfells, in a puzzled, ndering way, "what John will do without Dorothy." 'What'll the hull township do without her?" The nster paused, holding in her hand a cup into which was measuring spoonsfull of ground coffee. What ay, without any irreverence meant, is this, What was good Lord a-thinkin' of to take Dorothy Raimond heaven, and leave old bed-ridden Madam Jones, o has wanted to go this four years? Dorothy, so tty and young and gay, so bubblin' r with joy, gone in a flash, and John helpless and desolate, and old folks sick folks stayin' on to suffer! I tell , it shocks a body's faith."

'Mercy me, dear heart," said Mrs. Cranells, "don't talk so. The good Lord ows best. He's taken Dorothy either m the evil to come, or else to some od far beyond what we can imagine. I m to hear him sayin', 'Let not your art be troubled. Ye believe in God, be- ve also in me. In my Father's house many mansions.'"

Miss Rachel Ann did not reply. She s getting out bread and butter and ich preserves, knowing where Dorothy kept everything. A sound in the other om startled her, but she repressed an clamation. It was only John, coming wn with a look of gaunt, white misery his tearless countenance, and standing side the coffin, with a gesture that went the hearts of his friends. John had olized Dorothy. They had been married y a year. This was their new house, ilt and furnished to suit her. Every bit it was eloquent of Dorothy. John, too, s saying dumbly in a passion of mute bellion. "What could the Lord have en thinkin' of?"

Kind Mrs. Cranfells went to the stricken n, and persuaded him to come into the rm kitchen and have a bite of supper. e and Miss Rachel Ann gazed for a oment at the beautiful, silent figure of ir friend. A nameless peace and dig- y lay upon that lovely, queenly face. The man sat down by the table and tried eat, but the food choked him. He put head down on his hands and shook th great sobs.

'There! there!" said Mrs. Cranfells, tting his shoulder soothingly. "You've thing to reproach yourself with, so don't t this way, John."

'I have," he broke out. "I tried her tience lots of times. I brought mud in my boots and tracked up her clean or. I had the house painted white en she wanted it gray. I wouldn't let r join the church when she wanted to last Easter, cause I wasn't ready to join too. I've been cross, d scolded when the cooking didn't suit me. Oh! orothy, Dorothy, Dorothy, come back, and you'll see w changed I'll be!"

He tramped heavily off upstairs, and the women looked each other in grieved dismay. "It's always so; when ks are gone, we wish we'd been nicer to them, don't ?" Miss Rachel Ann remarked.

'John was right good to Dorothy," said Mrs. Cranfells. The clock struck one!

'You lie down on the lounge and kiver yourself with t quilt, Rachel Ann, and I'll take a nap in this easy eer. We're doin' Dorothy no good."

If the three—the husband and the two friends—could ve followed Dorothy behind that screen of silence n call death, they might not have grieved so sorrow- ly. Dorothy Raimond had never been so vividly ake, so resplendently alive, as when her last breath ated away, and her soul, dropping the body, went ht and free along the immortal road.

She was conscious of a strange gladness, a wonderful poise and freedom. As she walked beside a sparkling river, the flowers that touched her garment's hem were more fragrant than the roses. She walked with the elastic tread of a child, and first one, then another dear friend met her, and gave her greeting. Her mother, whom she had lost when she was a baby, came running over a green meadow, and folded happy arms about her, folded her closely. Her little sister Sadie, and her brother Ralph, were just behind; a troop of dear schoolmates; a girl especially whom she had loved and missed, one Pearl Maleen, all made her so welcome.

"You are just the same Dorothy," said her mother, "though you were so little when I came home. I'm so glad you are here."

Angels moved to and fro. They seemed very busy.

"You see," said Pearl, "they are forever flying around on the King's errands."

"Don't you do the King's errands too?" asked Dorothy. "Oh, yes, but not in the same way. They return to the earth, ascending and descending. We go no more out, after we have seen our Lord."

So they talked, and all around were friends talking, and Dorothy had glimpses of wide, beautiful homes, full of pictures and flowers, and the very air was sweet and buoyant and song seemed to fill it and make its background; song that was a radiance, alternating with silence that was a caress.

In the very middle of the gladness, there penetrated to Dorothy, a long, strange, wailing cry.

"Dorothy! Dorothy! Come back, my beloved!"

"It is John," she murmured. "John. He needs me." She made a mighty plunge into space, and awoke.

Mrs. Cranfells shook Miss Rachel violently. Her face was as white as chalk. Her hands were shaking.

"There's a noise," she said, "in Dorothy's room."

Miss Rachel opened the door. She started back in sheer affright. Dorothy was sitting up in her coffin.

"I'm alive, Aunt Rachel," she cried. "Where's John?"

Dorothy lived many, many years and was an old, old woman before she finally went to her heavenly home. But her descendants still tell how she lay three days in a trance and heard and saw unutterable things. Never was wife so adored, for John always knew she had been given back to him from the very portals of the grave.

THE SPIRIT O' THE MAY-TIME

The merriment o' May-time,
The Spirit o' the Spring-time;
Flowers bloom and children play,
And birds sing roundelay!

The world, so old and hoary,
In the May renews its glory—
And life's a joyous story
In the merry month o' May!

The Absent Friend

A CYNICAL adage tells us that the absent are always in the wrong. If assailed they cannot defend themselves, and it therefore behooves us to be very careful what we say about them. I have heard the most surprising accusations made about a child, to the effect that he was not to be trusted, that he committed wanton mischief, that he stole small articles; and when I remonstrated, saying, it is wicked to deprive a child of a good reputation in this wholesale way, I have been told: "Why, everybody in—— will say what we do." Sifted to its beginning, the story would probably resolve itself into thin air.

I wish we might spontaneously and instinctively rally our powers in defense of the absentee, whether he be young or old. Most people have more goodness than badness about them, why not take great pains to give them the credit of their good qualities, and not the demerit of their bad ones?

Suppose a Burglar Came

Undoubtedly you and I have often speculated as to what we would do if a burglar came. What a New York girl with presence of mind and nerve did, the other night, was to meet a burglar with a disarming politeness that drove him from the field. Miss Jeannette Thurber, quite early one evening, sitting in her room, wrote a letter, and thought she would leave it for posting in her father's room, on the next floor below. Entering the room quietly, she discovered a strange man standing by the table. "Who are you?" she inquired. The man turned and roughly pushed her into a chair, with violent threats and an order to keep perfectly still. The young lady promised silence, and said, "Why not take a seat yourself?" This nonplussed the burglar, who presently called to a hidden confederate, and directed him to leave the house, retiring backward himself while he kept the muzzle of a revolver pointed at the young woman. She had promised to give no alarm until the robbers had been out of the house two minutes, and she kept her word.

I have no idea how Miss Thurber managed to be so perfectly cool and self-controlled, except this: She is probably a girl who has disciplined herself in composure in the small everyday affairs of life, and the habit holds in the alarming crises, even when a burglar comes on the scene.

About Taking Cold

If you would resist the malady known as taking cold, do not get overtired. When the tone of the system is lowered, cold is apt to seize upon you. Daily bathing, with dashes of cold water on the throat and chest, and on the back below the shoulder blades, followed by a brisk rubbing with a rough towel, will prevent the tendency to cold. Do not overload the stomach with pastry and rich food, or with fried food of any kind. A good many colds may be laid at the door of candy and bon-bons, of which not only young girls, but also men and boys, are often inordinately fond.

Bye and Bye

In a recent novel, the mother of a young girl says to her, "The way young people do old people now, that same way other young people will do them, when they are old." Not long ago, a lady of mature age was very much hurt by the boorish rudeness of a young kinswoman, whose manner lacked the simple deference so becoming to her age, and so appropriate toward the age of the other. But she sighed as she commented upon it. "What else can I expect? I was shockingly rude and hateful in my own behavior to my mother, long years back, when I was Patsy's age."

Is it not worth while to reflect that we are constantly sowing the seeds for our future harvests? If we are unselfish and generous in youth, we shall find love and kindness about us when we grow old. If we are thrifty in youth, we shall not be roofless and paupered in the rainy day of age and infirmity. We shall receive what we give. The lesson should sink deeply into the soil of every heart.

A Homely Maxim

What can't be cured must be endured! This being the case, why mope and fret and protest and wear yourself out in vain repining? If it be God's will to send you some sneak in your lot, glorify him by the cheery courage with which you bring to bear on just that infelicity. Nothing lasts forever. The hardest puzzles have some solution. The longest road has an end. The most baffling situations have a clear. After the storm comes not only the calm, but the brightness that could not have been had not the storm swept the skies clear. And many a tempest has its rainbow before the thunder ceases.

"TO BE SPIRITUALLY MINDED IS LIFE AND PEACE"

The Life-Giving Spirit

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 31. ROMANS 8: 1-14

GOLDEN TEXT: "FOR AS MANY AS ARE LED BY THE SPIRIT OF GOD, THEY ARE THE SONS OF GOD." ROM. 8: 14

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WHY is this lesson inserted just here? Partly, no doubt, because Paul is about to sail for Rome, which makes it interesting and pertinent to read what he had written to the Church at Rome two years before. This lesson is also an impressive contrast with the preceding one, in that we there see Paul in a human court treated as guilty, though innocent, while in this lesson we see Paul self-condemned at the bar of God, yet acquitted through acceptance of a Substitute, who had died for him. There is a profounder connection with the last lesson, in the fact that Paul has just recounted to Agrippa his conversion in its more outward aspects, while in the seventh and eighth of Romans we may have the inward struggle of those three days of darkness at Damascus, and the burst of light for soul and body that followed (Acts 9: 9, 18). It is more probable that this was a later battle in his soul, after justification, as in the Epistle. The whole Epistle is our larger subject, with the eighth chapter its Mount of Transfiguration, as our lofty outlook. In the seventh chapter we see a disciple toiling upward in the night; in the eighth, the glory of the Lord from the face of the revealed Christ bursting on him.

I see a different law in my members warring against the law of my mind (7: 23). We cannot appreciate the victory noted in the eighth chapter, without reviewing the awful battle that preceded. And to understand the battle, we must briefly recall what precedes from the beginning of the Epistle. After his salutation, Paul proclaims the "Gospel" (1: 16), the good news of pardon through Jesus the Saviour, of protection and direction through Christ the King, for both Jews and Gentiles, who are alike sinners, and are alike called to rightness. This is to be secured, not by human efforts to do and be good, but by receiving the Spirit of God through faith in Christ, who died for us. Accepting Him as our substitute, we are pardoned; and accepting this free pardon, we have peace (5: 1).

Christ having died for us, it is as if we were dead, so far as our guilt and punishment are concerned. We are "dead to the law," as the drafted man in France was declared by the government to be, on the ground that he had previously hired a substitute who had been killed. "I am dead," he said to those who came to force him into the army. The recruiting officers thought him insane, but the government accepted his plea and set him free. So far as the law of military service was concerned, he was as good as dead. So one who accepts Christ's death in his stead, is as dead, so far as the penalty of sin is involved. But the Epistle presently shows us that the peace that comes with pardon, may be followed by new battles leading to a fuller peace, and that being dead to the guilt of sin, may not include death to the power and love of sin, which are graphically pictured in the seventh and eighth chapters, that follow the story of justification in the Epistle, as like experiences follow justification in the "living epistles" of real life. As Christ's death was followed by resurrection, and that of ascension, so crucified with Christ and in Christ as our substitute, we die to the old life of guilt, to rise into a new life of Christlike obedience, but, even from this, we may ascend into a yet higher life, delivered from the very love of sin, so that we love what God loves and hate what God hates. It is this supreme victory over the love of sin that Romans eighth pictures, following the struggle of a soul whose conscience and will belong to God, while his heart prefers sin.

"Sin no longer reigns, but it fights." That seems to be the exact condition pictured in the seventh of Romans. There we see the two men in us still at war, though the better man is no longer enslaved by the worse. The better man, indeed, is master, but the baser, though conquered, is not yet subdued, nor won over; and the two are inseparably chained, so that discord produces daily misery. At last it comes to be like the case of the martyr who was chained to a corpse. The love of sin in the heart seems to the quickened conscience like such a corpse, and he cries, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The word "flesh" in the Bible means not the body only, but human nature complete in its natural state. When a measure of spiritual life has captured the conscience and the intellect and will, often the heart and body refuse for a time to join in crowning Christ. The two camps in us keep up the conflict until the heart itself is conquered by love divine, and then, in place of the double-mindedness and discord of Romans seventh, comes the single-heartedness and peace of "the blessed eighth."

Here was a battle fought! I may not trace
The master skill and strategies revealed
Betwixt the hosts that gathered on this field:
I may not tell the final rallying-place
Whereon they marshaled, hurried, face to face,
The one to claim, the one to humbly yield:
I only know that here Self's cohorts kneeled
To beg of Love divine a prisoner's grace.

It was the old, decisive, sharp affray [drawn
Of Right-ousness and Wrong, whereto were Causes with more than civil issues fraught:
But other men of other times will say,
As we, of Malvern Hill or Marathon:—
"Behold this place! Here was a battle fought!"

FRANK W. HUTT.

No scene in the Bible has been more frequently repeated than the battle of the two natures in the seventh of Romans. Sometimes at conversion, sometimes after, such a battle occurs in the soul. A missionary tells of a poor African woman who once said to him, groaning heavily, that she had two hearts, one saying, "Come to Jesus," the other saying, "Stay away;" one bidding her do good, the other urging her to do evil. He read to her the seventh of Romans, and she exclaimed, "Ah, massa, that's me; and I know not what to do." But she learned to answer the cry, "Who shall deliver me?" by saying, "I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." To which we may add another story of a devout colored woman of a joyful Christian experience. She was one of a company of her race to whom a learned preacher was talking of the inward conflicts of sin as if we were never to be victors over the flesh until Death came to reinforce us in the battle with it. The flesh could be destroyed, he seemed to think, but not transfigured. He had expounded in this way on Romans seventh and eighth, when the ebony saint interrupted him smilingly to say: "'Pears like you don't understand them chapters." "What's the matter with my exposition, aunty?" "Why, honey, you talks as if we were to live in that miserable seventh chapter, and only pay little visits to the blessed eighth." "Well, that's just what I do think, don't you?" "Laws, honey, why I lives in the eighth." Christ is the end of the law for both. Justification and sanctification. Neither can be had by trying, both by trusting.

"THE SPIRIT ITSELF MAKETH INTERCESSION FOR US"

There is, therefore, now no condemnation. That means, there is no longer conflict because the two that fought are friends. My will is the will of my God. I love what God loves, and hate what God hates. Our hearts are one. Single-hearted peace has taken the place of double-minded strife. "I worship thee, sweet will of God."

Theresa had received a present, a little ebony cross, the ends of which were tipped with gold. She had it fastened to a blue ribbon, and wore it about her neck. At one time the cross-piece became loose, and she begged her father to repair the cross. "That I will do very willingly," said her father, "and by means of it will try to teach you a lesson how you may live in this world and no affliction or duty prove a cross to you. See, without this cross-piece the longer piece is not a cross; only when the cross-piece is added is a cross formed. So it is in every trial which we call a cross. The longer piece represents God's will; our will, which always desires to cross God's will, is represented by the cross-piece. Each cross you are called upon to bear, take from it the cross-piece—your will—and it will no longer prove a cross to you."

Not in dumb resignation
We lift our hands on high;
Not like the nerveless fatalist
Content to trust and die.
Our faith springs like the eagle,
Who soars to meet the sun,
And cries exulting unto thee,
O Lord, thy will be done!

Thy will! It bids the weak be strong,
It bids the strong be just;
No lip to fawn, no hand to beg,
No brow to seek the dust.
Wherever man oppresses man
Beneath thy liberal sun,
O Lord be there, thine arm made bare,
Thy righteous will be done!

JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

The law of the spirit of life hath made me free. This is the profoundest of all utterances on law and love and life and liberty. Liberty is the choicest fruit of a tree of life whose trunk is law, whose root is love. Law is no dread thing, but only love expressed in terms of life, and only under law there be any real liberty. Is it liberty for the train to leap the track, or only to bound forward on the rails of law? The only true liberty is that which is in the very life, when love of right inclines us to do only the thing we may do, and keeps us from the very desire to do the things we may not do. This is the power of the keys, given not to Peter only, but to all the apostles and to all Christians, who may have such a life of harmony with God that what they permit themselves will be what God permits, and what they forbid themselves will be what God forbids. That is binding and loosing on earth, as in heaven. This is again singleness of heart, the secret of peace, that we love what God loves, and will what God wills. Let us quote George MacDonald once more: "When God's will is our law, then are we but a kind of noble slave, but when God's will is our will, then are we his free children."

As many as are led by the spirit of God they are the sons of God. Of three steps in this lesson, this is the topmost. First, we are shown how righteousness or rightness may be put in place of guilt (vs. 1-4). Second, we are shown how human nature, "the flesh," may be filled with the divine nature, the Holy Spirit (vs. 5-11). Third, we see how servants, who obeyed God unlovingly, may become sons of God, in whom obedience springs from love (vs. 12-14).

There is a story told of a young prince having, as a body-guard, three good genii, who appeared in visible form at his summons, but behind whom always lurked the dark shadow of an uninvited and unwelcome evil spirit. Creeping closer and closer to the prince, this spirit would whisper in his ear scornful refutations of the wise advice given by the others.

"WHEREBY WE CRY, ABBA FATHER"

We are told that the bad counsel thus cunningly insinuated produced very baneful results, often leading the young man into actions of which his inmost heart disapproved; but we learn that in the end the good genii gained the day, and as the prince embarked on the river which wound to the glittering palace towards which all his life he had been journeying, the evil spirit fled, vanquished, while the three, whose ministry had been so constant and sustaining hovered round the bark, their wings spread protectingly over it, their voices raised in a grand chant of victory. Beneath the old legend there is a deep significance. In our hearts wages day by day a stern conflict between the old nature of the flesh and the new life of God's Spirit; but we, too, may look for victory through Him who, "able to keep us from falling," hath given us the assurance—at once a precept and a promise, "Sin shall not have dominion over you."

It is as if two mortal foes contended
Within my bosom in a deadly strife;
One for the loftier aims for souls intended,
One for the earthly life.

And yet I know this very war within me,
Which brings out all my will power and control,
This very conflict at the last shall win me
The loved and longed-for goal.

Ah! When in the immortal ranks enlisted,
I sometimes wonder if we shall not find
That not by deeds, but by what we've resisted,
Our places are assigned.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

The pre-eminent truth in this lesson is that double-mindedness is battling with God, and should give way to single-heartedness as the pathway to peace. Why is a tarred rope strong? Because the tar binds down all the single hempen filaments that would otherwise stand out independently, and makes their combined strength contribute to that of the whole. This enables us to understand the prayer, "Unite my heart to fear thy name" (Ps. 86: 11). This might well be the golden text to bridge the passage from the seventh to the eighth of Romans. And with it we may put such kindred verses as "Purify your hearts, ye double-minded" (Jas. 4: 8; see also James 1: 8), and "Be not of double heart" (I. Chr. 12: 33), and "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light" (Matt. 6: 24).

Gleanings

"Double-mindedness is abnormal and unmanly. God made us to sail by a pole star and a chart that he has given us. He made us to rule our spirits, to keep the lower nature in subjection to the higher. We have no business to let the stokers from the hold come on the quarter-deck, or go into the pilot-house, and take control of the ship. They are to serve, and not to rule."

One of the most striking apparent examples of a double character that history furnishes is cited by Dr. McCosh in his work on The Divine Government, out of the history of Sweden. The famous Chancellor Oxenstiern had shown many kindnesses to one Lilienhorn, advancing him to a post of honor and trust. Lilienhorn perfidiously requited his benefactor by entering into a conspiracy against his life; but as the set time drew near, touched with some relentings, he sat down and wrote, in a disguised hand, a letter of warning to the chancellor, designed to dissuade him from attending a certain court festival, and thus to save his life. The great man despised the anonymous letter, and kept his appointment, attended by Lilienhorn, who stood by and saw his master and friend murdered by assassins. And probably there were people in Stockholm who heard the story and remarked, "How strange! How inexplicable! What a self-contradictory character! He must have lived a double life." Yes, but in his double life the soul was "under" and sin "on top," and it is the dominance, whether of good or evil, that determines character and destiny.

HOW "MOTHERING" SAVED THE BABIES

A GROUP OF BABIES WHOSE LIVES HAVE BEEN SAVED BY MOTHER-LOVE

ALL theories regarding the artificial upbringing of an infant have been shattered by practical experiments that have just been concluded in St. Vincent's Home, a Philadelphia institution for the care of motherless babies. It became evident to the medical attendants and nurses of the Home, not long ago, that something was radically wrong with the babies. They had the best of care. They were washed and fed regularly, they were petted and caressed as much as could be where there were so many applicants for such attentions and so few to give them. Yet the babies pined and died. The doctors were nonplussed.

One day there came to the Home, at the invitation of the matron of the institution, a woman who had successfully brought to healthy manhood and womanhood a large family of children. She was conducted over the wards, dormitories and nurseries. First to a large room, the floor of which was covered with babies just able to crawl, toddle or walk uncertainly, holding to the walls. The visitor looked at a small specimen of humanity,crying feebly in a corner. The door had been opened too smartly and the baby, having been clinging to it, had been knocked to the floor. It was crying softly to itself—the cry of a hurt child, who knew that no one would notice or comfort it. The visitor noted the tone, but said nothing. The rest of the children were sitting on the floor, crooning to each other, like old men and women. They held out their arms as the visitor approached, and when one was taken up, the others cried to be taken up too. But it was impossible to take them all up, so most of the babies were left on the floor, crying very softly to themselves.

"The children are simply pining for mother-love," the visitor said. "No well-regulated baby can do without being hugged to a motherly bosom. It must be comforted when it is hurt. It's little troubles must be assuaged by one in whom it feels confidence. Babies are not fashioned to be left in a crowd together. They must have individual attention."

The officials were confronted by a serious problem. The babies were dying so fast, something had to be done at once. The matron summoned the doctors and nurses, and it was determined to engage the services of foster-mothers and try what "mothering" would do to the ailing infants. A number of Italian women were found, willing each to take one of the babies, and add it to their own family, for a consideration. The worst cases were selected for the initial experiment. In two weeks, the Italian women reported with their charges. From pining, hollow-eyed infants, the babies had become round-faced, bright-eyed, full of chirping cheerfulness.

The babies who were brought back did not relapse into their former melancholy condition, but diffused their own merry mood around the play-rooms of the home. Half a dozen of the "mothered" infants wrought a complete change in the atmosphere of the place.

As fast as means would permit, the pining babies were taken from the wards and given to the foster-mothers, until all had had their turn. The beneficial effect of the treatment was most marked in every case. Hereafter the foster-mothers are to be a regularly recognized adjunct of the institution. The doctors at the home have decided that a better medicine than drugs has been found for babies who pine and die without any apparent physical ill.

"Why," said the matron, in talking the matter over with the writer, "the babies were simply dying of broken hearts. It seems strange that we never divined the cause before. Babies know when they are not getting what a baby is entitled to—a hug and a soothing word when it cries for reason. So they in time cease to cry, like normally cared-for infants, because they know it's no use. They cry unnaturally and silently. Then they begin to pine, and they pine to death, unless something is done. That something is individual care from women who will treat the child as one of their own. We think we have solved the problem of the care of babies in an institution like this." H. D. JONES.

PINING FOR MOTHER-LOVE AFTER A MONTH'S MOTHERING

A DOUBLE BEREAVEMENT

SELDOM has a church suffered within a few days two bereavements so prominent as those which befell the Methodist Episcopal Church during the early part of this month. On May 1 died Bishop Randolph S. Foster, and on May 4 Bishop John Fletcher Hurst passed away. Both men were held in profound reverence by both the clergy and laity, and their loss is deeply mourned.

Bishop Foster was in his eighty-fourth year, and had been sixty-six years in the ministry and thirty-one years a bishop. His ministerial work commenced in Kentucky, where he held appointments more important than usually fall to the lot of so young a man. He was little over seventeen when his Conference first licensed him, but even then his oratorical gifts and his spiritual power were widely recognized. Nor was his theological equipment undeveloped. He championed Methodist doctrines against a Calvinistic critic of considerable eminence, and afterwards embodied his arguments in a book which, in its day, had a marked effect on public opinion. In 1844 he was transferred to the Ohio Conference, and six years later he entered the New York Conference, and was appointed to the church in Mulberry street, which subsequently became St. Paul's Church. While he was still serving there, he was elected President of Northwestern University at Evanston, Ill. Later he became Professor in Drew Theological Seminary, and subsequently President of that institution. In 1872 he was elected bishop. It was an office he did not seek, and it is said that for some time he hesitated to accept. His preaching wherever he had been stationed had been followed by revivals, and he doubted whether it was wise to give up that work for the episcopate. The counsels of friends, however, had weight with him, and finally he accepted the office. His administration was kind, genial and inspiring, winning him the personal reverence and affection of all with whom he came in contact.

THE LATE BISHOP HURST

Bishops Foster and Hurst, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Called to their Reward

Bishop Hurst was a man of very different personality. There is in Christ's service, as the apostle points out, a diversity of gifts, but the Spirit is the same. God has many kinds of work for men to do, and he uses the man best fitted to do a special work. Bishop Hurst was a theologian, a college-bred man, and one who had a profound belief in the necessity of an educated ministry. He was a native of Maryland and a graduate of Dickinson. Instead of entering the ministry, when at the age of twenty he graduated from that institution, he went to Germany for a course at Halle and Heidelberg.

He became professor of ancient languages at the Hedding Literary Institute at Ashland, N. Y., and subsequently returned to Europe to preside over the Methodist Mission Institute at Bremen, and afterwards at Frankfort. In 1871 he was again in America, at first as professor of historical theology in Drew Theological Seminary and later as President of that institution. One of his characteristic achievements was the prompt raising of an endowment fund when the financial storm struck the college. His election to the episcopacy came in 1880. It was a fitting tribute to his character, energy and devotion. It did not, however, change the bent of his mind. The conception of a great Methodist university had long been in his thought and he used his new office to bring it to realization.

After concentrated and intense labor, he had the satisfaction, in 1891, of seeing his plans nearing maturity. Nearly three million dollars had been obtained, and at last a charter was granted. From that time the institution at Washington, D. C., occupied all his thoughts. He lived to see the completion of the first of its beautiful buildings and to satisfy himself that his grand idea would be carried out. The church owes much to his far-sighted policy and his self-sacrificing devotion. The new generations of ministers are little likely to forget their benefactor.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Alice S., New Orleans. I think you once referred in THE MAIL-BAG to the phrase, "I expect to pass through the world but once." Who was the author?

It is attributed to Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire. Engraved on his tombstone are these words: "I expect to pass through the world but once; if, therefore, there be any kindness I can show, or any good thing I can do to any fellow human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer or neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

Mother, Plainfield, N.J. 1. When does THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn open? 2. What is the cost of giving a child a ten days' vacation at the Home? 3. Please explain how a cot is endowed and how much it costs.

1. It will open the last week of June. 2. Three dollars secures a ten days' vacation to a tenement boy or girl at the Home, including transportation both ways, medical examination, food, supplementary clothing and all incidentals. 3. Twenty-one dollars endows a cot a whole year. Every endowed cot is marked with the name of the benefactor, framed and hung above the cot itself, and a record of all the occupants of the cot during the entire season of outing is forwarded to the donor of the endowment. The children themselves frequently write touching little letters of gratitude to their benefactors.

A. B. G., Cookport, Pa. Why was Saul's name changed to Paul after his conversion?

Nothing is said in Scripture to explain the change of name. It was, however, common for Jews to bear, besides their own name, "another borrowed from some country or people with which they had become connected." Thus, Saul among the Jews, would be Paulus among the Gentiles. As he, with Barnabas, had been rejected by the Jews, it may have been that the conversion of the eminent gentile, Sergius Paulus, decided Saul to change his own name to the Gentile form of Paul. The sacred historian, wishing to mark the point of transition from darkness to light in Paul's life, emphasized the change of name, calling him Saul first and Paul afterward.

L. F., Ocean Grove, N. J. Can you give me any arguments in favor of being married by a minister rather than a Justice of the Peace? A near relative, who is soon to be married, says that there were no ordained ministers in the time of Christ, who ushered in a new order of things. Despite the protests of friends, he says he will be married by a Justice. Can you point out any New Testament passages, or tell me anything of the early history of the Church bearing on the case?

Marriage is both a civil and religious ceremony. The civil marriage has reference to the legal status of the parties; the religious ceremonial, to the sacred compact entered into as in God's presence. It is usually considered that those who neglect the religious ceremonial attach very little sacredness to the marriage tie. This is wrong, as marriage, like baptism and communion, is a divinely-ordained institution, and ought to be so regarded universally.

Housewife, Waco, Tex. Is "domestic science" as a subject of text-books and a course in schools, purely an invention of our own times?

We think not. The term "domestic science" is modern, but certain chapters in Proverbs may be classed with the subject. Xenophon's Economics is "the oldest existing work on household management," says Prof. Haskins. "From this charming Greek classic—of which there are many translations—we have our very words, economy and economics. The only other really great book on the subject, an imitation, Della Famiglia, takes the young bride over the house, gives her the keys, teaches her right ordering of affairs, inducts her into the science of family finance," etc. It was one of the most popular books of the Renaissance. Instruction in domestic arts was, we believe, a part of the training of all maidens in the Middle Ages. "Domestic science" as now understood, may doubtless be considered a revival and an advance.

Reader, St. Louis. Has the Pope the right to confer titles of nobility?

There are orders of knighthood which the Pope can confer. They are not held in high esteem except by zealous Roman Catholics, and they are not recognized by secular governments. They confer no privileges on the holder. The most famous is the Order of the Golden Spurs, which is one of the oldest Orders. It is said to have been instituted by Constantine. In 1840 its gift was restricted by special command of Pope Gregory to persons who had done some special service to the church. Besides this, there is the Order of St. Peter, the Order of St. Paul and the Knights of St. George, and of St. John of the Lateran.

H. R. C., Santa Rosa, Calif. If it is a fact, as often stated, that thousands perish of cold and hunger in New York and all our large cities every year, is it not our duty to relieve all this destitution and suffering at home before going abroad?

We do not know the origin of such a statement, but you may set it down as absolutely without foundation. We are surprised that any statement of the kind should find credence anywhere.

C. M., Danville, Va. Why is the willow an emblem of mourning?

Maud Going, in With the Tree says the custom of using the willow as an emblem of mourning may possibly be traced to the influence of this: "By the rivers of Babylon, we . . . wept . . . we hanged our harps upon the willows" (Ps. 137: 1, 2). Yet the fact that weeping willows were placed over graves in China seems to indicate that people who could hardly have been affected by anything Biblical, also used the willow as a symbol of grief. Among the poets of many years back "the crown of willow" and the "willow wreath" was the token of hapless love.

R. D. J., Rockford, Ill. Can the wealth of the United States be stated in round numbers? If so, please give it and say how it compares with that of the rest of the world.

The wealth of the world is estimated at $400,000,000,000, and that of the United States is probably one-fourth of the whole. In 1895, Munhall gave England as the richest country in the world. Its wealth per capita was $1,584; next came Scotland, $1,257; Australia, $1,228; France, $1,210; United States, $1,123; Denmark, Canada, Holland, Switzerland, Germany, Argentina, Belgium, in their order. Percentage of debt to wealth was lower for this than for any other great country, being less than one per cent. France led with twelve.

William B., Augusta, Me. Was Hamlet a real person or simply a creation of Shakespeare?

Shakespeare founded his play on the Danish story of Amleth, which is recorded in the Saxo-Grammaricus. The word "Hamlet" is from amlod, a crazy person.

Inquirer, Providence, R.I. What is the reason that a lion's head is so often used in public fountains here and abroad? Where did the custom originate?

In Egypt, doubtless. The inundation of the Nile occurs when the sun is in Leo, and this was symbolized by the use of the lion's head in drinking fountains. The Greeks and Romans adopted the device and the moderns have simply followed their example.

A. B. K., Corona, Calif. 1. Who is the man mentioned in Rev. 13: 18? 2. How can he have a number for a name? 3. What peculiar measure of time is that quoted in Daniel 7: 25?

1. It is understood to refer to an incarnation of Satan or evil, which, according to the seer, will appear in the closing days of this dispensation. He is to be a powerful king, who will be at the head of a federated union of ten nations. An executive appointed originally for a special purpose, but eventually holding and wielding permanent power. It is to be exercised against religion, and especially against the Jews. He is the Antichrist of prophecy. 2. The number is the sum of the values of the letters of his name in the Roman notation, such as is used on the face of a watch. Thus: the name Ludovicus, contains the number 666. L, 50; u, 5; d, 500; v, 5; i, 1; c, 100; u, 5; the sum of which is 666. 3. The "time, times and dividing of a time," are usually understood as three and a half years, which is half of the prophetic week of seven years, referred to in Daniel 9: 24-27. The covenant was to be for seventy weeks. They were divided into three periods of seven, sixty-two and one. The last week, supposed to represent seven years, being the time of a covenant broken in half by the perfidy of Antichrist.

THE NEW TABERNACLE

Congregationalists in all our States and beyond the sea, will rejoice that a beginning has been made in the building of the new Broadway Tabernacle, New York. The name is dear to them, associated as it is with movements described in a recent issue of this journal, which gave the former building the rank of the Cathedral of Congregationalism. The new edifice, which will stand on the corner of Broadway and Fifty-sixth street, will be sufficiently imposing to deserve the name. Besides its auditorium, occupying the front of the building, there will be a structure in the rear on Fifty-sixth street, ten stories in height, containing a parish house, the social halls, and other quarters associated with the institutional church. The corner-stone was laid on May 2 by Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, the pastor. Dr. A. J. Lyman and other well-known clergymen took part in the ceremony.

Student, New York. I tell my friends in college that I am there to get an education, not to become an athlete, so I have refused to join the cricket club and the boating club. Am I not right?

We are not sure that you are altogether wise, though your course is better than the other extreme of neglecting study for athletics. Neither extreme is good. You would study better and be a gainer in many ways if you did some good muscular outdoor work. Mere walking exercise as a constitutional is not enough. You need something that will stir the blood and that has an interest in it. We should hear better sermons and have a better feeling in the pulpit, more life and sunshine, if during the college life there had been more physical activity.

S. E. D., Reserve, Kan. Is it known who wrote the books of the New Testament?

Not positively, though the critics have by no means proved their contention that they were not written by the men whose names they bear. You will observe that the Gospels are said to be "according to Matthew," etc.; that is, the book we have is the Gospel as Matthew gave it. Whether he actually wrote it or it was compiled by some one else from his teaching, cannot now be proved. So with Mark, Luke and John. Until some better reasons are produced than have yet been brought, orthodox Christians will continue to believe that Matthew, Mark, Luke and John wrote the Gospels. Acts was written by Luke. The next thirteen books by Paul. The writer of Hebrews is unknown, but the Epistle is now generally credited to Apollos. The author of James was not James the apostle, but James, the brother of our Lord. The Epistles of Peter, especially the second, have been the subject of dispute, but we can see no valid reason for doubting that Peter wrote them. So with the Epistles of John and Jude. Revelation differs so completely in style from the Gospel of John that the critics aver that the two books could not have been written by the same man. They incline to the belief that John wrote the Revelation but not the Gospel. Still, many years probably elapsed between the two, during which John may have changed his style of writing. Your other questions we cannot answer, and we doubt if any one can.

S. E. A., Hoboken, N.J. What is the origin of the saying that it takes four men to make a salad?

It is probably derived from the Italian proverb that a wise man brought salt; an avaricious man, vinegar; a generous man brought oil; and a fool mixed them.

Mrs. J. L. de N., Des Moines, Ia. How did the months come to be named as we now know them?

January was so called by the Romans from Janus, the heathen deity who was keeper of the gates of heaven; February is from Februa (the Purifier), a name applied to Juno; March is from Mars, the war god; April from aperio (to open), or the opening month; May is from magius or maius (originally derived from the Sanskrit word mag, to grow); June from Juno; July was so called in honor of Julius Cæsar; August in honor of Augustus Cæsar: September is the seventh month from March, when the year formerly began; and October, November, and December the eighth, ninth and tenth.

Miss Addie P. Follett, Providence, R. I., writes that her great aunt, Mrs. Daniel Ormsby, of Fayette, Me., wrote in 1878, and published in the Maine Farmer, of Augusta, Me., the poem, entitled, "My Old House," which was credited to Adeline Naomi Fox, in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under the title, "Waiting the Call."

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. E. F. W., Denver, Colo. Write to Interior Department, Washington, D. C.

M. W. S., Amnville, Pa. There is no reliable data. It is all fragmentary. Write to New York Sun, which recently published an article on the subject.

Industrial Work at The Bowery Mission

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

RARELY, if ever, has a nation enjoyed such a period of marvellously rapid growth and material development as our own during the last few years. To New York City especially, has a large share of this unwonted prosperity fallen. New bridges are being flung over its rivers, and tunnels bored underneath them; railroads have perfectly gridironed the city; huge sky-scraping buildings of twenty and thirty stories, princely mansions, mammoth dry goods buildings, theatres, hotels of unprecedented dimensions and dazzling luxury are coming into existence every day. Exceeding everything else in the vastness of its operations and expense, is the subway enterprise. All these undertakings have necessitated an outlay of capital which is simply fabulous, almost incalculable.

And yet, will it be believed, there are thousands of men to be found every day in the streets of New York, who seem absolutely unable to secure employment? Cheap immigrant labor is largely the cause of this, though there are multitudes who would be glad to work at any price. Big contractors, however, have come to depend so exclusively on the supply of immigrant laborers, who are managed by "padrones" or "gangers" of their own particular nationality, that other unskilled labor stands little chance of employment.

One cold day, during the recent winter, a hurried call came to the Bowery Mission from an employment agency, for one hundred and fifty men, to "help out with a job" on the Pennsylvania Railroad. In two or three hours we had several hundred men in the Mission begging to be allowed to go. We made a selection of the required number, gave them sandwiches and coffee, and sent them down to the train in charge of one of our workers. To our great grief and disappointment they were instantly rejected, for no other reason than that the only language they could speak was English.

Many workless men have no doubt been very foolish in coming to New York City. Many of them have been dissipated, and lazy, and crooked. But they are here, and must live, somehow, and do live, somehow. In the Bowery Mission, we feel that our first duty is to find work for men that are able to work. Especially do we feel our responsibility toward the vast number of men who, through diffidence, nervousness, want of address, want of decent clothing, or through lack of a certain "catch on" ability, seem unable to find work for themselves. In our after meetings, this is always made a matter of the most searching inquiry. The men who stay to our after meetings, as a rule, are sincerely anxious to do right, and, for them, honest employment is an absolute necessity.

In the first place, we endeavor to provide temporary employment. We always need a few men around the Mission, our aim being to keep the building scrupulously clean. Moreover, it means a great deal to a young convert, to be for a time in the atmosphere of Christian sympathy and love. At the Memorial House, also, which is a new and spiritual adjunct of the Mission, Mr. Card, the Superintendent, endeavors to keep from eight to twelve men, using them in the kitchen, or making beds, or cleaning the rooms, giving them every alternate day in which to seek work. The good work done by the Mission and the Memorial House has recently been such as to make it comparatively easy for men going with Mr. Card's recommendation, or one from the Mission, to secure permanent employment in neighboring factories. Thirty of the Memorial House residents, all converts of the Bowery Mission, are employed at present in one of the large works nearby. There are also friends of the Mission in the city who regularly send to us for temporary help in jobs around the house, gardening, window-cleaning, house-cleaning, carpet-laying, etc. Very often, also, we are called upon for men to carry "banners," distribute circulars, address envelopes, shovel coal, wash dishes, etc. So that from our "Broom Brigade," hundreds of men every year graduate to more permanent positions. There are many in New York City and elsewhere to-day, filling positions of trust, who a short time ago were homeless waifs upon the Bowery.

One good Christian gentleman is glad to receive any Bowery Mission convert who is fitted for engineering, firing, or running an elevator. Another gives a helping hand to dry goods salesmen. Another to restaurant men. Another to type-writers and stenographers. One of the most successful salesmen in one of the largest houses in the city was a young man, who, through his drinking habits, became separated from his wife and children, whom he had not seen for ten long years. He came to our meetings, gave himself to God, and a few months afterward, through the instrumentality of one of our workers, secured the position referred to. To-day he has a fine standard to-self, and has, to every knee, reunited with his long-separated family.

In another large house you will find one of the permanent floor-walkers, who is a convert of the Mission, also rescued by his wife after a considerable separation. In one of the down-town banks, there is a trusted messenger, who, two years ago, landed in this country a penniless lad, friendless on arrival, whose drinking was disgusting and ruinous of everything he had. Without friends or acquaintances, he tramped the streets for several weeks, and almost died of starvation. Passing down the Bowery in despair of heart one night, came into the meeting and gave himself to God. He was splendidly educated, a fully accredited M. D. of Trinity, Dublin. Then began his struggles for rehabilitation. His first work was honest cleaning and painting a thing he had never done before. Then a job of carrying, distributing or unpacking for a time, at a dollar a day. Then certain floating spells of canvassing and the like, until at last he secured a position in the establishment where he is now to be found. Here, for the last year, he has worked with such ability and effectiveness that he has recently been given charge of his department. During the whole of this time he has never been absent from his post of duty at the Mission, and is now one of our most respected and successful leaders.

Notwithstanding our success in securing employment for our converts, this duty is, and always will be, a very onerous one. The task of interceding with former employers on behalf of erring men, which is sometimes imposed, is often a hard one. The difficulty of getting a fresh foothold in the commercial world for men who have fallen from the straight path of honesty, is very great. But it is sometimes illumined by flashes of real, genuine, human kindness, all the more beautiful because it is so rare in this hard, driving, commercial age.

A business gentleman said to me, the other day, whilst I was pleading for another chance for a man with a criminal stigma upon him, "Mr. Hallimond, it is the man who has done wrong and wants to do right that we ought to help; a man without a blot on his record can look after himself." So, quietly, yet surely, is the principle of love working in the midst of the great mass of greed and selfishness of our time, and so it will work "until the whole lump shall be leavened."

J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent.

HEATHEN WOMEN*

Their Condition an Agonizing Appeal for Christian Compassion

CRUEL as heathenism is to men, it is a hundredfold more cruel to women. None suffer as they do from the spiritual darkness. Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, the famous traveler, declared that after intimate contact with the women of Japan, Korea, China, Western Thibet, the Malay States, Cashmere, Persia and Asiatic Turkey, she realized as she could have done from no other experience the value of Christianity. In Christless lands, the life of woman is a misery from the cradle to the grave. In most of those lands she is kept secluded in the Zenana or the harem, receives no education, and spends her time in frivolous and often degrading pursuits. Time and again she was applied to for poison, which was to be made the instrument of jealousy. With the intellects of children, they had developed the evil passions of adults, and were greedy and malignant and utterly without principle. In India, the custom of child marriage and the prejudice against widows had both exerted an appalling influence on the women, brutalizing and degrading them beyond the conception of one who had not witnessed their condition.

Christianity has done nothing more noble or more fruitful than in reaching out its elevating hand to them. The Zenana mission in India, and the medical missionaries in other lands, have as yet touched only the fringe of the problem, but already gratitude has sprung up in millions of hearts. In China, above all other lands, owing to the frightful suffering involved in the custom of foot-binding, Christianity comes with a message of mercy. The women missionaries who have seen the process and have heard the cries of the sufferers, are eloquent in their appeals for help. More missionaries, especially women doctors, are needed, and none can preach the Gospel with so much effect as they. When they have saved a life, or relieved suffering, their patients will listen to their message. Through them, too, the future generation is reached, for the boy remains in the harem during his childhood and does not forget the lessons he learned there. The need is pressing, and it carries with it influences of the most far-reaching kind.

A TALMAGE MEMORIAL

Presentation of a Pulpit in Grace M. E. Church, Harrisburg

At a service held in Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, Harrisburg, Pa., on Sunday, May 10, a very interesting event took place. It was the presentation of a Talmage memorial pulpit. The sermon was preached by the Rev. William V. Kelley, and among others who assisted in the service were the Rev. George Edward Reed and Rev. J. Wesley Hill. The presentation address was delivered by the President of the Board of Trustees, the pastor and congregation accepting in responsive sentences. In his prayer the pastor said:

O thou, who, by the mouth of thy servant David, hast said that thy Word is perfect, converting the soul, give thy blessing, we beseech thee, upon this pulpit, erected in memory of thy servant, Thomas DeWitt Talmage, and grant that what is proclaimed from it may fall as the rain and distil as the dew, that thy children who hear it may thereby be made fruitful in good works, to thy honor and glory, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The entire service was peculiarly sympathetic and appropriate, and was listened to by the large audience with intense interest.

A Much-Traveled Letter

A medical missionary, writing to Dr. Klopsch from Punjab, India, says:

I am sure you will be pleased to see the enclosed letter, which I received by recent mail from the United States. I gave Ten Cents's HERALDS to my brother's family for their Christmas this year, and this epistle came from my nephew, a boy student at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn. He is fourteen, and the oldest of my brother's three children, and you see they all enjoy the paper. May God bless you for providing Christian families with such good reading for Sunday evenings! The American ministers in danger from pernicious literature that is scattered broadcast, and found often in young hands on the Sabbath. This is the boy's letter—a letter that was received from New York to India, and their mail goes back again!

My Dear Aunt:—We are all greatly indebted to you for your generous gift, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We read it every Sunday evening aloud, and get from it new ideas which last us all the week. Not only that but we think every time we read it, of our dear Auntie in India, who helps us keep Sunday sacred. I am sorry you have tried all over New York, you could not have selected a more interesting, up-to-date magazine for us. I must close. Papa is waiting now to read to us from your generous gift.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A QUEER HONEYMOON*

BARNACLES, the horse, who had been moored to a kedge-anchor, watched the next day's proceedings with interest. He saw the captain and Lank drag up from the beach the twenty-foot dory and hoist it up between the wheels. Through the forward part of the keelson they bored a hole for the king-bolt. With nut-bolts they fastened the stern to the rear axle, adding some very seamanlike lashings to stay the boat in place. As finishing touches, they painted the upper strakes of the dory white, giving to the lower part and to the running-gear of the cart a coat of sea-green.

Barnacles was experienced, but a vehicle such as this amphibious product of Sculpin Point he had never before seen. With ears pointed and nostrils palpitating from curiosity, he was led up to the boat-bodied wagon. Reluctantly he backed under the raised shafts. The practice-hitch was enlivened by a monologue on the part of Captain Bean.

Half an hour later old Barnacles, from about the middle of his barrel down to his shoes, was painted a beautiful sea-green. Like some resplendent marine monster shone the lower half of him. It may have been a trifle bizarre, but, with the sun on the fresh paint, the effect was unmistakably striking. Besides, his color now matched that of the dory's with startling exactness.

"That's what I call real ship-shape," declared Captain Bean, viewing the result. "Got any more notions, Lank?"

"Strikes me we ought to ship a mast, so's we could rig a sprit-sail in case the old horse should give out, cap'n."

"We'll do it, Lank; fust rate idee."

So a mast and sprit-sail were rigged in the dory. Also the lines were lengthened with rope, that the captain might steer from the stern sheets.

"She's as fine a land-goin' craft as ever I see anywhere," said the captain, which was certainly no extravagant statement.

How Captain Bean and his mate steered the equipage from Sculpin Point to the village; how they were cheered and hooted along the route; how they ran into the yard of the Metropolitan Livery Stable as a port of refuge; how the captain escaped to the home of Widow Buckett; how the splicin' was accomplished — these are details which must be slighted.

The climax came when the newly-made Mrs. Bastabol Buckett Bean, her plump hand resting affectionately on the sleeve of the captain's best blue broadcloth coat, said, cooingly, "Now, cap'n, I'm ready to drive to Sculpin Point."

"All right, Stashia, Lank's waitin' for us at the front door with the craft."

At first sight of the boat on wheels Mrs. Bean could do no more than attempt, by means of indistinct ejaculation, to express her obvious emotion. She noted the grinning crowd of villagers, Sarepta Tucker among them. She saw the white and green dory with its mast, and with Lank, villainously smiling at the top of a step-ladder which had been leaned against the boat. She saw the green wheels, and the verdant gorgeousness of Barnacle's lower half. For a moment she gazed at the fantastic equipage and spoke not. Then she slammed the front door with an indignant bang, marched back into the sitting-room, and threw herself on the hair-cloth sofa, with an abandon that carried away half a dozen springs.

For the first hour she reiterated, between vast sobs, that Captain Bean was a soulless wretch, that she would never set foot on Sculpin Point, and that she would die there on the sofa rather than ride in such an outlandish rig.

Many a time had Captain Bean weathered Hatteras in a southeaster, but never had he met such a storm of feminine fury as this. However, he stood by like a man, putting in soothing words of explanation and endearment whenever a lull gave opportunity.

Toward evening the storm spent itself. The disturbed Stashia became somewhat calm. Eventually she laughed hysterically at the captain's arguments, and in the end she compromised. Not by day would she enter the dory wagon, but late in the evening she would swallow her pride and go, just to please the captain.

Thus it was that soon after ten o'clock, when the village folks had laughed their fill and gone away, the new Mrs. Bean climbed up the step-ladder, bestowed herself unhandily on the midship thwart and, with Lank on lookout in the bow, and Captain Bean handling the reins from the stern sheets, the honeymoon chariot got under way.

By the time they reached the shell road, the gait of the dejected Barnacles had dwindled to a deliberate walk, which all of Lank's urgings could not hasten. It was a soft July night with a brisk off-shore breeze, and the moon had come up out of the sea to silver the highway and lay a strip of milk-white carpet over the waves.

"Ahoy there, Lank!" shouted the bridegroom. "Can't we do better'n this? Ain't hardly got steerage-way on her."

"Can't budge him, cap'n. Hadn't we better shake out the sprit-sale; wind's fair abeam."

"Yes, shake it out, Lank."

Mrs. Bean's feeble protest was unheeded. As the night wind caught the sail and rounded it out, the flapping caused old Barnacles to cast an investigating glance behind him. One look at the terrible white thing which loomed menacingly above him, was enough. He decided to bolt. Bolt he did, to the best of his ability, all obstacles being considered. A down-grade in the Shell Road, where it dipped toward the shore, helped things along. Barnacles tightened the traces, the sprit-sail did its share, and in an amazingly short time the odd vehicle was spinning toward Sculpin Point at a ten-knot gait. Desperately Mrs. Bean gripped the gunwale and lustily she screamed:

"Whoa, whoa! Stop him, captain, stop him! He'll smash us all to pieces."

"Set right still, Stashia, an' trim ship. I've got the helm," responded the captain, who had set his jaws, and was tugging at the rope lines.

"Breakers ahead, sir!" shouted Lank at this juncture.

Sure enough, not fifty yards ahead, the Shell road turned sharply away from the edge of the beach, to make a detour by which Sculpin Point was cut off.

"I see 'em, Lank."

"Think we can come about, cap'n?" asked Lank, anxiously.

"Ain't goin' to try, Lank. I'm layin' a straight course for home. Stand by to bail."

How they could possibly escape capsizing, Lank could not understand, until, just as Barnacles was about to make the turn, he saw the captain tighten the right-hand rein until it was as taut as a weather-stay. Of necessity, Barnacles made no turn, and there was no upset. Something equally exciting happened, though.

Leaving the road with a speed which he had not equalled since the days when he had figured in the "Grand Hippodrome Races," his sea-green legs quickened by the impetus of the thing behind him, Barnacles cleared the narrow strip of beach grass at a jump. Another leap and he was hock deep in the surf. Still another, and he split a roller with his white nose.

With a dull chung, a resonant thump, and an impetuous splash, the dory entered the accustomed element, lifting some three gallons of salt water neatly over the bows. Lank ducked. The unsuspecting Stashia did not, and the flying brine struck fairly under her ample chin.

"Ug-g-g-gh! Oh! Oh! H-h-h-elp!" sputtered the startled bride, and tried to get on her feet.

"Sit down!" roared Captain Bean. Vehemently Stashia sat.

"W-w-w-we'll all b-b-be d-d-drowned, drowned!" she wailed.

"Not much we won't, Stashia. We're all right now, and we ain't goin' to have our necks broke by no foul horse, either. Trim in the sheet, Lank, an' then take that bailin' scoop." The captain was now calmly confident and thoroughly at home.

Drenched, cowed and trembling, the newly-made Mrs. Bean clung despairingly to the thwart, fully as terrified as the plunging Barnacles, who struck out wildly with his green legs, and snorted every time a wave hit him. But the lines held up his head and kept his nose pointed straight for the little beach on Sculpin Point, perhaps a quarter of a mile distant.

Somewhat heavy weather the deep-laden dory made of it, and in spite of Lank's vigorous bailing the water sloshed around Mrs. Bean's boot-tops, yet in time the sail and Barnacles brought them safely home.

"'Twa'n't exactly the kind of honeymoon trip I'd planned, Stashia," commented the captain, as he and Lank steadied the bride's dripping bulk down the step-ladder; "and we did do some sailin', spite of ourselves; but we had a horse in front an' wheels under us all the way, just as I promised."

CHILDREN, dear, "the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come," and it is right and wise that our little folks should puzzle their heads no more with brain-teasers, but run out-doors and play. "Puzzles" are for winter days, but lo! the winter is past.

We have kept the Puzzle Department open a little longer than we first intended, because so many small people were interested in it. But now, we feel that the woods and the brooks call you, and the garden hath a voice to bid you come.

Announcements of prize-winners for Competitions 36 (of April 22), 37 (of April 29), 38 (of May 6), and 39 (of May 13), will appear in due order. An early issue will contain portraits of a number of our little first-prize winners, who have favored us with their photographs.

Every child who has entered these "Competitions" deserves credit for whatever good work he or she has done. Many answers which could not command prizes have interested us because of their merit. We appreciate heartily the thousands of letters received from little friends, who tell us that they have enjoyed the "Puzzles," and that this Department has led them to search the Scriptures more. May all lessons thus learned, all messages of cheer thus found, abide in your hearts and make your summer happier.

Answers to Competition 35, in our issue of April 15th, are: 1. Rome, 2. Pilate, 3. Bartimæus.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

H. E. B., Harrisburg, Pa., writes:

There is scarcely a day goes by that I have not a prayer answered. Not long since in a great trouble, I cried to Him, and I received the witness that my petition was granted, even before what I prayed for came to pass.

C. E. J., Carmel, N. Y., writes:

I too, wish to add my testimony to the list of those who have had special answers to prayer. In a case of very urgent necessity, quite recently, He heard and answered my request.

L. B., Chillicothe, O., writes:

I was very much grieved about an absent member of the family. I prayed earnestly that I might receive a message from him. The message came, and I give God thankful praise.

Silk Worker, Paterson, N. J., writes:

God heard and answered my prayer for better work. I could scarcely make a living at what I was doing, but I did my best, and he opened the way to other employment.

E. C. P., St. Louis, Mo., writes:

I read in "Answered Prayers" how a mother prayed for a son, nine years before her prayer was answered. That inspired me to pray more earnestly and fervently for my seemingly lost husband, for whom I had prayed nearly sixteen years. God has answered my prayer. My husband has reformed, leads a Christian life, is a good husband and loving father, and we have a happy home again. Truly God hath wrought a miracle before my eyes.

THE SOURCE OF LIFE

Power to Live for God Imparted by the Spirit

By Mrs. M. Baxter

OUR Lord said: "I tell you the truth: It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I go I will send him unto you" (John 16: 7). When we think of who it was that spoke thus, who as a man was himself anointed with the Holy Ghost for life and ministry—we see the immense import of the words. He put himself on our level that he might, in a sense, put us on his level. Again and again he declares that he can do nothing by himself, and he bestows on us the same power, the same indwelling Holy Spirit who empowered him, to live in us, and to speak and work through us.

The apostle Paul, having spoken of the utterly lost and depraved state of man by nature, both Jew and Gentile (Rom 1: 2), shows in Rom. 3: 4 how God has found a way to justify, and freely through the propitiation which he himself set forth in Christ Jesus, on the only one condition of faith in his blood, every sinner who believes. Moreover, he shows in Rom. 5: 6 that there is in Christ for us not only pardon and justification, but also a new life of dominion over sin. In Rom. 7, he shows us a man under the law, willing and striving to please God and to obey the law, but continually doing what is both against God's will and his own. And in Rom. 8 he shows us the great and wondrous secret how to be free from the law, from our flesh or self-life, and therefore from sin, by the power of another life—the life of God the Holy Spirit within us.

But the very first necessity is that we should be fully established in grace. We can never walk in the Spirit until we know to the very full what it is to be in Christ. First of all, no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God did. The flesh is simply what we are in ourselves by nature—our powers, our will, our affections, and it may include our character, position, advantages, and disadvantages: the sum total of what we are in ourselves. The law has never had power to make man other than he is by nature. But Christ has fulfilled it in the flesh of man by the power of God the Holy Ghost, who is here called the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. And our beloved Lord went away from earth to secure for us the same power to live a life of perfect obedience to God as he lived when he was upon earth.

"They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh." This is not necessarily what are generally called fleshly sins, such as drunkenness, gluttony, impurity, etc.; but also enmities, strifes, jealousies, wraths, passions, divisions, heresies, envyings (Gal. 5: 2, R.V.). All these things arise from self in some way or other, and pride, self-consciousness, despondency, and exaltation are all in the same line. Those who are self-reliant are after the flesh, those who take credit for what they do are after the flesh. Paul, who knew what he was saying declared: "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." He had learned to abhor himself and distrust himself, and therefore he was not wounded when others disparaged him—"With me it is a very small thing to be judged of you or of man's judgment" (1. Cor. 4: 3).

The mind of the flesh is death—death physical and spiritual. A large number of chronic invalids have become so by yielding more and more to invalid habits, and to continual occupation with themselves. A large number of lunatics have lost their reason through pride, self-will, or self-occupation of some kind or other. Those who have the charge of the insane know well that if only they can succeed in getting their attention off themselves, they may frequently get well.

It is impossible for the Holy Spirit to dwell in anyone who is not prayerful—God gives Him in answer to prayer (Luke 11: 13)—or in anyone who does not read the Word of God. For the Spirit of God speaks more often through the Word than any other way. And "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God"—they obey him.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXXV
Second Safety Psalm

1. They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever.

"THE MOUNTAINS ROUND ABOUT"

2 As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even forever.

Double safety is assured to those who trust in the Lord. "The name of the Lord is a strong Tower: the righteous runneth into it and are safe." Men build mounds for protection, but God builds mountains to protect his own. Neither the wicked nor their inventions can reach the righteous. Like the mountains, they abide and are safe.

PSALM CXXVI
Soul-Winner's Psalm

5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.
6. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

"BEARING PRECIOUS SEED"

This is a genuine revival song. It is more than that, it is a full compendium on how to win souls, few or many; Prayer, Seed, Tears; then the Sheaves brought in. When the worker will weep over souls, there will be a sure harvest. Oh, for a revival that will make the heathen confess that "the Lord hath done great things for them."

PSALM CXXVII
Father's Psalm

3. Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward.

"HIS QUIVER FULL OF THEM"

4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth.

5. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

When fathers are built by God in character and love, their children will be like cities on a hill. Many a man eats the bread of sorrow and passes sleepless nights over wayward boys, when, if he would examine his own past life, he would discover the reasons. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. Let children be a heritage of the Lord, and a covenant-keeping God will keep the father from shame.

PSALM CXXVIII
Mother's Psalm

3. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house: thy children like olive plants round about thy table.

"AS A FRUITFUL VINE"

This is the Mother's Psalm, bounded on the east by wifehood and on the west by grandmotherhood. No human gift so great as a good mother. To be well-born and well-bred is more than gold. God pity the man whose wife is not a Christian! There is double danger—aye, more than that.

HOW A WESTERN MISSION GREW

SIX years ago, Dr. Alexander DeSoto began a rescue work among the homeless and outcasts in the City of Seattle and vicinity. He established the Wayside Mission, at No. 38 Railroad avenue, and the Mission Hospital on the old steamer Idaho, which, being long out of commission, lay idle in the harbor of Seattle. With his own means, he renovated and remodeled the vessel, and transformed her into a clean, wholesome and attractive Floating Hospital. Up to the present time, thousands of men and women, the most wretched and depraved, have found care and comfort in the Mission Hospital, in addition to many thousands of others who have found shelter and food in the Wayside Mission lodging house.

DR. ALEXANDER DESOTO

After a time, the Western city began to appreciate the work that was being done quietly among the outcasts and opium fiends, and indeed among the neglected and godless generally, who were being reached by the methods employed. A little band of consecrated men and women from the Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational churches, gave occasional help in the work.

It was a work which took Dr. DeSoto and his associates into the depths of Seattle's slums — a work which others shuddered to do. One of the leading journals thus describes it:

> The old ship Idaho has never been for a day or night without its score of sick, and miserable, and incurables, who have nowhere else to go. For the most part, these people were opium fiends and fallen women, classes of beings who in Seattle have found no other helping hand. For years the old steamer was known as one of the most notorious opium smugglers that ever disturbed the waters of this coast. It seems that it has been divinely ordained that her greatest service should be the sheltering of the depraved victims of her early traffic.

For several years past, the floating mission on the Idaho has served the purpose of a reception hospital for Seattle, and it has received a small modicum of municipal support. But the work itself has expanded to dimensions which compel an enlargement of present facilities. Dr. de Soto has recently transferred to the hospital a valuable property, which will be used as a permanent endowment, and the proceeds from which will be sufficient to permit of the enlargement of the work to the desired extent. He proposes to erect a four-story stone building, to cost, fully equipped, $80,000, to supersede the present mission hospital. The plans for the building are in the hands of the architect, and construction will be begun in the near future. Dr. de Soto will personally superintend its erection, and will have the co-operation of a number of business men of philanthropic inclinations in his project. The new structure will probably be known as the Wayside Mission, as it will be the successor of the hospital boat. It will care for accident cases and for destitute patients, though the larger building will give the work a broader scope. The building itself will cost about $50,000, and the equipment will be the most modern. The furnishing and equipment of the building, after it is finished, will cost from $20,000 to $30,000, and there will be accommodation for one hundred patients. It will be the second hospital in size in the city. On the ground floor will be ambulance room and offices, while upon the next two floors will be large wards, and private rooms for the patients, and on the top floor, accident ward, operating room, rooms for drugs, medicines, etc. It is the intention to provide the hospital with lecture room, in order that a medical school may be established, where men and women will be trained as nurses.

During its entire history, the work of the Wayside Mission and its conductors, while aiming to save the sick and succor the helpless, has been a spiritual work as well. No patient has ever entered there who has not been brought under the influence of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. All have been impressed with the fact that, however poor and wretched may have been their lot in life, and however black their hearts with sin, there is in the Saviour a fount of healing, and pardon, and peace. In these years of consecrated effort, a large number have been led to Christ through the influence of the mission. Among its beneficiaries have been men and women of many races, and all ages and conditions. All have been treated with the same unvarying kindness and consideration, and there are many hundreds of them living useful Christian lives to day, who date the turning-point in their lives from the moment they came into the good Samaritan fold of the Wayside Mission.

Dr. de Soto is still in the prime of life, and full of earnestness and enthusiasm in his work. From the beginning, he has conducted the mission as a work of faith, pure and simple, and his reliance upon the Divine approval and support has been signally rewarded.

Paradise are watered. Hope at that instant blossomed anew in her young heart. Some want or sorrow, she resolved to keep herself worthy of a past which was still so dear.

That night Hetty's dreams were sweet. She did not catch a glimpse of a tall, dark-eyed girl named Dora Haines, at Miss Nute's Seminary, the one who tied up her bouquet and chose the inscription, probably she will never in this world know of her existence. It was her own mother she saw in her dreams, standing by her bedside in shining white raiment, and she held out her arms as she used to long ago when Hetty was tired or troubled, saying:

"My child, the message is from me, Heaven is so near the earth that the May flowers could bring it."

The next morning Hetty Harvey started out on her pilgrimage under the ensign of success. Nothing outside of her was changed, it was her inner world that had undergone a revolution. "Thoughts are things;" she no longer thought failure, and invited it by distrust of herself and of others.

The Matron of the Home told her she did not know of another situation open anywhere.

"I sent a girl to the very last one yesterday," she said. "She came with superior recommendations. There's a rich Miss Wilkinson on Fifth avenue, near Thirty-fourth or Thirty-fifth street. I haven't the least ground for thinking she wants any help, or could direct you elsewhere. If you choose—but maybe I ought not to send you there—those rich ladies get irritated if we apply to them too often."

Somehow Hetty was not afraid this morning. Last night if the Matron had ended her suggestion with a "but," she would not have ventured to ring at Miss Wilkinson's palatial house.

Now she walked briskly up to the door-bell, and it was answered by a smart, severed man-servant before she had fairly let go of the knob.

"Doesn't Miss Wilkinson want a seamstress?" she asked, in a cheerful, expectant tone.

"No, miss, not as I knows of; fact is, I'm sure she don't."

"Won't you have the kindness to ask her. I should like very much to see her."

The man's orders were to admit no one who had not a special appointment with Miss Wilkinson, but he hesitated an instant. There was something in the manner of this applicant which distinguished her from others who had besieged his mistress.

The latter had a private sitting-room on the lower floor of this English basement house, where she spent the early hours of the morning in answering letters and attending to her many interests and charities. At this critical moment she heard distinctly the talk at the front door.

"Let her come in, James!" she called out: The earnest, hopeful, self-respecting tone of that girlish voice outside went straight to the rich woman's heart. If Hetty had not been prompted to call there first, Miss Wilkinson would not have heard her voice, she would have been engaged with company upstairs in her parlor.

Hetty was ushered into the presence of a plainly-dressed, middle-aged woman, with gray hair, and a strong, thoughtful face. She had a great deal to do in her business hours, and was not given to wasting many words.

Looking at the stranger a moment in silence, she then asked her usual question in similar cases:

"Where did you sew last?"

"At Mrs. Perry's, on West Fortieth street: but she's gone to Europe, ma'am. She liked my work very much, I know she did, but I've no way of proving that to you now; I can only ask you to try me for yourself."

She raised her eyes fearlessly, with a touching faith and honesty in them, and fixed them upon Miss Wilkinson's.

Had she been chilled by a single disappointment this morning, before coming to this lady, were her mood that of yesterday, it would, in spite of her, tell upon her face and manner, sound out of every word—what we are cannot fail of its effect when put to the test—and it is questionable whether her application, without references, would have received the same attention, for the fountain of sympathy would not have been touched. Now she was conquering by the power of her own thought of goodness divine and human, her own freshly inspired belief in success.

"I'll try you for a day," said the lady, "although I can't say I really need you. There are some little gowns and dresses here to be cut out and made for an orphan asylum. I was just about to send them out to be made, it is more convenient generally than having a seamstress in my house; but I don't believe I shall mind having you," she added with a smile. She liked Hetty's frank face, her neatly brushed hair, her modest deportment.

"James, show this young woman up to the sitting-room."

Hetty grew tremulous with joy, and the wondering James, who had overheard the interview, said to himself:

"She ain't even asked the girl her name! I never knew Miss Wilkinson to be got round quite this easy before. What's come over her?"

Hetty gave satisfaction that day and many more days; and Miss Wilkinson ended by becoming a firm and valuable friend, securing her a permanent situation in the course of a few months.

And later on, when her young protegee was settling in a home of her own as the wife of a man who was in every way worthy of her confidence, she sent her a sewing machine as a wedding present.

Hetty might not be able to argue it out satisfactorily in a court of justice, but in her own heart she will always feel sure that the little bunch of mayflowers, coming to her at a crisis in her life to revive her sinking courage, was a turning-point in her destiny.

MISSIONS IN THE ISLANDS*

How Great Changes the Gospel Has Effected in Polynesia

SINCE the days of Captain Cook, the work of missions in the islands of the Southern Pacific has been prosecuted in joy and sorrow, but always in unfaltering faith. John Williams gave it early the benediction of his blood, and only lately we have had to mourn the martyrdom of the intrepid James Chalmers. The apostolic labors of Dr. John G. Paton and a host of other consecrated men, have been devoted to the same field, and still there is much to be done.

No one can read the story that Captain Cook told of the condition of the islands, when he visited them at the close of the eighteenth century, without a thrill of horror at the awful miseries and terrible orgies that were witnessed there. The sick and the aged killed, infanticide prevalent, cannibalism in most of the islands, no semblance of law or order, and matters growing worse. It needed courage to go there with the Gospel: but there was no lack of volunteers. The London Missionary Society had the honor of sending the pioneers in 1797; the Church Missionary Society followed, in 1814; the American Board in 1820: the Wesleyans in 1822: the Presbyterians in 1848, and the Australian Board in 1801. It was necessary not only to learn the barbarous dialects, but to reduce them to writing, before any effectual work could be done. Real progress comes only when the heathen have the Bible in their own tongue, but how much preparatory labor had to be done! The Bible is now in the hands of the people of Tahiti, Rarotonga, Samoa, Tonga and Fiji, and larger portions in the languages of other islands. The difference in social life in the Christianized islands from those not yet evangelized is so marked that it is appreciated by the heathen themselves. The native Christians, too, are proving their sincerity by themselves becoming missionaries. They risk their lives with the heroism of the early martyrs, in going to heathen islands and carrying to them the blessed message which has transformed their own hearts and homes.

WHITE HOUSE WREATHS MADE TO PLACE ON THE SOLDIERS' GRAVES AT ARLINGTON CEMETERY

White House Flowers for Heroes' Graves

The Propagating Gardens from which our Presidents send out many Beautiful Tributes on Decoration Day

THE Civil War had been over three years before Decoration Day came into existence. In 1867, Mr. L. E. Dudley, then of Washington, D. C., but now a United States Consul in Canada, and who had been prominently connected with the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic, suggested that the Washington posts decorate the graves of the soldiers at Arlington. The idea was a happy one.

One day that spring, a large company went out to the historic grounds (which had formerly been the home of the Confederate leader, General Lee, but which the government had used as the headquarters of the Virginia division of the army during the war, and toward its close had converted it into a national soldiers' cemetery), and after a simple memorial service, scattered the few flowers which they had brought over the resting-places of their fallen comrades.

The Grand Army of the Republic was organized at Springfield, Illinois, in 1866; and in 1868, "the soldiers' idol," General John A. Logan, was elected commander-in-chief of the organization. To him belongs the honor of formally establishing Memorial Day as a fixed feature of the calendar. In the spring of that year, he promulgated his famous "General Order, Number Eleven," which ever since has brought out the veterans in all parts of the country on the 30th of May, when they march indeed to martial music, but only to the cemeteries, where strewn flowers tell of their sad but peaceful errand.

Next year General Grant came into the White House, and he gave Memorial Day his heartiest sympathy from the start. The White House conservatories were small affairs then, not much beyond Mrs. Pierce's "Lean-to" of glass, on the south side of the servants' quarters at the west of the mansion, while the Propagating Gardens were but embryonic; yet all of the flowers of the President's House and grounds were gladly gathered and sent for the grave decoration. On one of these occasions, during General Grant's second administration, a touching incident occurred. It will be remembered that the close of the war found hundreds of soldiers encamped at or sick in the hospitals, that had been improvised in the houses and churches of Washington. Many of the widows and children of the dead soldiers had also come to the National Capital, to entreat the government to do something toward their support. For this reason, a "Union Soldiers' and Sailors' Alliance" had been organized, and out from it had grown a soldiers' and sailors' orphanage, which sheltered a large number of children. On the Decoration Day referred to, these children had gone out to Arlington in a body, to help scatter the flowers on the graves; some of them to place the blossoms over those of their own fathers lying there. It so chanced that President and Mrs. Grant had come out, and with them were General and Mrs. Sherman, while in the same party were General and Mrs. Sheridan, and General and Mrs. Howard. When they saw the little group of fatherless soldiers' orphans standing together, ready to begin the distribution of flowers, with a simultaneous impulse, the four distinguished couples left their carriages, and going over to the children, took them by the hands and joined the procession as it started to make the rounds of the cemetery. They went from grave to grave, distributing the flowers, talking to the little folks with words of love and sympathy.

GARDENER GEORGE H. BROWN IN THE PROPAGATING GARDENS, WASHINGTON

He has charge of all the White House floral tributes which are made for Decoration Day

Theodore Roosevelt, who was too young to serve in the great conflict from which Decoration Day sprang, is the only President who has ever made the Memorial Day address at Arlington, the largest of the national soldiers' cemeteries. President Lincoln made the first memorial address at the dedication at Gettysburg—a speech which will always remain one of the most notable ever uttered. Both Harrison and Garfield made Decoration Day addresses while they were members of Congress, and a few months before his death, President McKinley said to a Grand Army Committee, who called at the White House to invite him to do so: "Every year, since I have held the office, I have wanted to make a Memorial Day address at Arlington. If it is possible, I shall be very glad to do it next May: but if not, you may count on me sure for the anniversary following." Alas! on the next Memorial Day the bereaved nation could only lay a loving tribute on his grave.

Flowers constitute a most important part in all Decoration Day exercises, and the occupants of the White House have, without exception, been more than generous in supplying those which are grown on the government reservations, at the Propagating Gardens, or in the conservatories. For many years, the flowering and foliage plants have been cultivated especially with the view of having them in abundance for the 30th of May. "Uncle Sam's" landscape gardener, Mr. George Hay Brown, is an old soldier, and has had charge of the Propagating Gardens for the last thirty-three years, during which time it has been one of his chief pleasures to bring the flowers to a state of perfection for that date. "Uncle Sam's" gardens have been a matter of slow growth, but they are now the largest and finest in the country.

When Mr. Brown went into his present office, in the first year of the seventies, all the hot house plants the government owned could have been packed into one large express wagon. The only provision made for them was a small conservatory down in the east end of town, and a few glass boxes on the White House. The Monument Park, now one of the finest reservations of the capital, was then a big cattle pasture and dumping ground. But

The 20th CENTURY WIFE and MOTHER

IV.—The Time of the Harvest

By MARY VIRGINIA TERHUNE

"THERE is no possibility of denying or ignoring the fact—the purpose—the raison d'etre, of woman, is to be a mother, as the raison d'etre of a fruit-tree is to bear fruit. And woe to the next generations; for everybody knows that only the children of quiet and reposed women are healthy and intelligent.

"The New Woman is not to be found outside of Great Britain, where woman is her husband's inferior, and of the United States, where she is his superior." Thus Max O'Rell, in a book that has many grains of sound sense mixed with much glittering epigram-dust and a vast deal of flummery that passes with the masses for smartness.

The first dogma quoted is as true as if taken from the received canon of Holy Writ. Woman's first and highest mission is to bear fruit. I have said the same in the earliest paper of this series. The witty essayist flies off at a tangent in order to achieve the flippant saying anent the New Woman, instead of carrying forward the story of the mother's after-life, the fruition, of which her nursery work is but the promise and foreshadowing.

How incomplete is our clever author's conception of the perfected design, is evinced by his contrasting portraits of the happy mother at forty, with her children's arms about her neck, and of the enlisted soldier in the "New Woman Army" at the same age.

Sensible girls with sensible mothers seldom marry until they have passed their legal majority. The college-bred woman marries at twenty-five oftener than at twenty. At forty, then, her life-work is in full swing. Her daughters and sons are just beginning to appreciate how vital is their need of her. Her statues are still in the clay. If she has taken intelligent care of her physique and kept pace with her charges in mental activity, she is at fifty fresh of heart, lively of intellect, and has as much "staying power" of body as was hers at thirty. Long practice has made household cares lighter than of old; she has learned to live by the day, and not to reckon with one, or with many possible morrows before they are upon her. Knowing life for what it is, she faces it gallantly, "heart within and God o'erhead."

Her grandmother was a confessed old woman when her half-century was completed, and relegated to the chimney corner. Our Twentieth Century matron, at the same age, steps into a wider sphere of action. The Literary Clubs, which have elevated the mental tone of society in every city and hamlet in the land, are officered and manned by women who have reached and passed middle age. These manage the benevolent and religious Women's Boards, which are a significant and prominent feature of the times in which we live.

Those of us who had the privilege of attending the meetings of the great Ecumenical Council, held in New York in 1900, will never forget the spectacle of the thousands upon thousands of uplifted faces turned toward the platform whereon sat, on the evening of "Women's Day," white-haired matrons, directing the order of speeches made by reverend and distinguished men alternately with earnest, dignified women. All were moved alike by one sublime purpose, all uttered one and the same prayer—"Thy Kingdom come!"

Max O'Rell libels such women, and casts contempt upon the men who work with them, when he pens this sweeping and shallow paragraph: "Where is that New Woman to be found? Put together a hundred women, intelligent and of good society. Take out the beautiful ones; then take out the married ones who are loved by their husbands and their children, and kindly seek the New Woman among what is left—ugly women, old maids, and disappointed and neglected wives."

I affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that the best workers in charitable boards, church guilds, and literary societies conducted by women, are they who have nourished and brought up children to be an honor to their parents and worthy citizens in the world; have been true helpmeets to their husbands, good neighbors and judicious housewives. The day has gone by when rant against "blue-stockings" and "strong-minded women" passed with thoughtful people for sound doctrine. By degrees so easy that they have been imperceptible to the casual observer of men and manners, the duration of active human usefulness has been extended, until the warrior-statesman, called suddenly in his fifty-ninth year to a nobler field and higher powers, is mourned as one who has fallen in the full richness of his prime.

"A woman is just as old as she feels," says a French proverb, and our modern matron elects to flourish—if not in immortal youth—in sustained maturity which has a glory of its own, unknown to hasty, crude nonage. She feels well, she looks hale, her bow abides in strength. Such an one is a power in the land wherein she dwells. In her home she is the centre of motion, the heart of family life.

"That little woman is the cohesive power—the cement that holds us together—the spirit of unity and the bond of peace," said the son of a gray-haired mother of a large family. "We are an affectionate family, but I tremble to think of the swift disintegration that would follow, were she withdrawn from earth. Perhaps she would not be reckoned a brilliant woman by common acquaintances. With us, she has always been the impersonation of a benign and yet just Providence. She has lived with, and for us, until our life is in her. She is MOTHER! That comprises it all.

"The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her. Her children also shall arise and call her blessed."

Many years ago, I called through the telephone to an intimate acquaintance to ask if she had in her library Frances Power Cobbe's Duties of Women. The dear soul was one of the "worrying kind," and the wheels of the household machine chanced to drive heavily that day. Her tone had an edge the transmitter and a mile of wire could not take off.

"Duties of Women!" she said, sarcastically. "I never heard of the book! Women have the same duties as hens!—Nothing more and nothing less!"

The mother of the by-gone days we have outlived held fast to this belief, and too often put it into literal practice. While her children were young and helplessly dependent upon her fostering care, she kept continually with them, going out and coming in and finding sustenance for them. When their wings began to grow, and they ventured short flights into the beautiful, tempting world beyond the poultry-yard, she let them go alone. By the time the cockerels and pullets could scratch a living for themselves, they had ceased to recognize her as their parent. The shelter of her wing meant nothing to them.

The Progressive Age has not left us mothers behind in its onward and upward sweep. "Once a mother, always a mother," is our motto. Matronhood and motherhood have a larger and a wider meaning for us and for our offspring than was dreamed of a century, or even a half-century ago. Life sparkles until the last grain of sand has left the glass. It is like the Tree planted by the River, "which bare all manner of fruits and yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations."

Mr. Brown, as executive of the Engineering Corps of the War Department, had made more than one barren place in Washington to "blossom as the rose"; and when it was decided to utilize that site, he took hold of the problem with his usual energy and judgment. Landscape-Gardener Brown has had in view the object of making the Propagating Gardens something after the style of the Government Supply Nurseries of Paris. He has gathered rare plants, shrubs, and trees from everywhere, until the collection now surpasses anything on this side of the water, and in some respects cannot be equalled in Europe. There are twenty-three greenhouses in connection with the gardens and over a million plants are cared for in this vast nursery. All of the plants and shrubs for the three hundred and two government reservations of the capital are started there. Eight hundred and fifty thousand plants, under the general classification of "foliage plants," are among this number. Of these there are several hundred thousand of the enanymus varieties, the many-colored, tiny "carpet plants," which show so effectively in making a flower-bed design. Beside these, this year there were twenty-two thousand geraniums grown, three thousand pansies, ten thousand roses and tube roses, two thousand violets, seven thousand carnations, five thousand chrysanthemums, and innumerable varieties of the more rare orchids, poinsettias, and crotons.

On Decoration Day, these flowers grown by the government, are gathered and contributed with the utmost generosity for decorative purposes. A month before the date of the day the President, or more often the mistress of the White House, sends an order to the Propagating Gardens, designating the number and kinds of floral designs which are to be sent to the cemeteries from the Executive Mansion. It has often happened that the Presidents have taken these to the burying grounds in their own carriages, and have themselves placed them on the heroes' graves. The last Decoration Day in which Mr. McKinley was in the White House, he ordered a number of set pieces; but when he went out to Arlington in the afternoon, he had his carriage filled with cut flowers, and went himself to the new-made mounds of those who had fallen in the Spanish-American war, and strewed them with the blossoms he had brought from the White House conservatories.

MONUMENT TO THE "UNKNOWN DEAD," ARLINGTON

Many distinguished United States army officers have found their last resting-places at Arlington, and at other cemeteries near Washington. General Logan lies at Rock Creek, a lovely, quiet retreat east of the city. In the early morning hours of Decoration Day, before the crowds assemble, Mrs. Logan always comes to the grave, and kneeling there alone, places upon it the floral tribute of her love. The widow of General Phil Sheridan follows the same plan, at the grave where her hero sleeps, on the gentle slope of the hill just east of the Arlington mansion. Mrs. Sheridan and her children, now all young women and men, come almost as soon as it is daylight on Decoration Day.

From the White House on this Decoration Day the following floral designs will be sent: Two thirty-inch wreaths made up of roses, carnations, and orchids, for the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon and Grant's mausoleum, on Riverside Drive in New York. A wreath of rare colored flowers, thirty-six inches in diameter, will go to the tomb for The Unknown Dead at Arlington; similar ones measuring twenty-four inches will be sent to Canton, Ohio, as a tribute to the martyred President, and to Arlington for the Sheridan resting-place; and twenty-inch wreaths of pure white buds and smilax will bear the President's cards on the graves of brave Generals McCook and Carroll, who rest in Arlington, and for the founder of the Day, General Logan, at Rock Creek Cemetery.

THE SIMPSON MEMORIAL WINDOW — THE BUST OF LONGFELLOW IN THE ABBEY — THE PEABODY STATUE

AMERICAN MEMORIALS IN LONDON

PREACHER, president, patriot, poet, philanthropist, is the way this theme divides itself in rhetorical phrase; translated, it would read: Simpson, Lincoln, Lowell, Longfellow, Peabody, five names written h in the Hall of Fame, names immortal in life and ers, illustrious in character and achievement.

London is the throne-room of the nations, the high altar where the worthiest of the worthy are enshrined in "storied urn and animated bust." Surpassing honor and dignity rest upon the life immortalized within these gates. The young life of the Western world has put her stamp here in five notable instances. Memorials have been erected to men recognized on both sides of the Atlantic as statesmen and sages.

THE LINCOLN TOWER

In the ancient church where John Wesley preached, Hon. Joseph H. Choate, American Ambassador to the Court St. James, unveiled, on the 14th of November last, memorial window to Bishop Matthew Simpson. The cation of this memorial is significant. The church as founded and built by the father of Methodism in 78.

When the great preacher died, thirteen years later, ie number of his followers on both sides of the tlantic had reached 119,000. When the Ecumenical ouncil was held in this cradle of Methodism in 1891, ie number of adherents had reached 24,899,421. Near is building John Wesley died, and within the churchard his sacred ashes lie.

The old pulpit occupied by Wesley still remains, ut the interior has been greatly modernized. Two of ie columns supporting the galleries, are contributions om American Methodists, costing $500 each. This indow is the inspiration of Bishop Vincent. It was ade in Munich, and in glorious colorings represents aul preaching at Athens, low on the left is a miniature of the peer of American Bishops. There, also, may be read the inscription:

> Erected by American Methodists to the memory of Bishop Simpson. He was born 21 June, 1811, and died 18 June, 1884. He was a holy man, an eloquent and mighty preacher, and a great Bishop.

It is but a turn in the road to the Lincoln tower of Christ Church, Westminster Road, an imposing edifice, the tower alone costing $35,000. Rowland Hill founded Surrey Chapel eighteen years before the close of the eighteenth century. Newman Hall, a man of rare genius and catholic spirit, succeeded him, and under his leadership this superb edifice was erected. While the building was still in the hands of the architects, Dr. Hall conceived the idea of dedicating the tower to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. Within this tower sleeps Rowland Hill, the tablet of dedication on the walls looks down upon the epitaph of the great preacher, two liberators still making conquests. Here you may read:

> Inaugurated 4th July, A. D., 1876, by Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart.
> The memorial stone was laid 9th July, 1874, by the American minister to this country.

> The cost (£7,000) was defrayed equally by English and American contributions obtained by the Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B.
> It was built in commemoration of the abolition of slavery effected in 1865, by

> And as a token of international brotherhood.

> GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST.

We make our way to Westminster Abbey. As we enter the Chapter House, a window, rich in color, commemorates America's patriot-poet. There are four sections to this massive memorial. The left panel holds a shield borne by angels, with the arms of the United States. There are other angels holding shields, containing the arms of Harvard University, the United Kingdom, and the arms of Westminster. The two figures to the right are those of St. Botolph and the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. The third panel holds a massive figure of Sir Launfal, the angel with the Holy Grail, and Sir Launfal and the Leper. The last section contains figures of St. Ambrose and the emancipation of slaves. Below the reveal of the window there is set in high relief the head of the poet, with the inscription:

> This tablet and the window above were placed here in memory of
> JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
> United States Minister at the Court of St. James, from 1880 to 1885
> By his English friends.
> VIRTUAS
> Born 22 February, 1819, died August, 1891.

In the hush of this silent Abbey we are surrounded by the names and the remains of the mighty dead. Grouped lovingly in the "Poet's Corner," are poets, dramatists, and authors. Here rest Chaucer, Spenser, Dryden, Dr Johnson, and Macaulay. Amid this assembly, loving hands have placed a bust of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Within a few feet of the white marble face of this poet who loved the sky, and was alive to the tender influence of the seasons and retold their story to men, they brought Tennyson after his great spirit had "crossed the bar," to hold silent fellowship. In chiseled words on the marble are recorded:

> HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
> This bust was placed amongst the memorials of the Poets of England by the English admirers of an American Poet. 1884

In the very centre of London's busiest mart, we find, in statue, the benevolent face of George Peabody, the great American philanthropist—the poor boy who made his way from a clerkship in a grocery store to the proud eminence of an international benefactor. Amid the stress of London's poverty his princely heart came to the rescue, and he expended $2,500,000 for the better housing of the poor. Queen Victoria offered him a baronetcy, with other honors, but the simple-hearted man said: "No; all I want is a letter that I may carry back to my native land." The letter came, and with it a miniature of the "Mother Queen." For the education of the freed slaves of America he gave $3,500,000. On the fourth of November, 1869, his own great spirit was set free. As shades stole upon him, he said: "It is a great mystery. I shall know all soon." His funeral was held in Westminster Abbey. The Queen sent his body home in the war ship Monarch, and Americans welcomed with sorrow the honored dust. W. W. Story's life-like statue of Peabody is located in the very heart of London. The simple wording on the granite base is

A Mission Hospital in Dark Arabia

N no country are Christian doctors more needed, and nowhere can they exercise nore influence, than in Arabia. Among the esert Arabs, actual cautery is the favorite emedy for all diseases. There is hardly one Arab among a hundred who does not bear hese kei marks on his body, and even infants re burned most cruelly. Where cautery ails, they often have recourse to words written on paper from the Koran, or to magical ormulas inscribed on cups or with ink on the atient's body. I have seen a magical cup of reat value, with a long inscription that began s follows:

"This blessed cup is against all poisons, and emodies well-tried advantages, namely against the tings of serpents and scorpions, against fever, ravail, bowel complaints, colic, wounds, heat of he liver and the spleen, and for strength. The ick person, or his messenger, is to drink from this up, water, oil or milk, and he will get well, by the ermission of God, the Most High.

The Arabs are very superstitious. The childwitch, called Um-el-Subyan, is feared by all mothers in Bahrein. Arab surgery is ignorantly and piteously cruel. Limbs are amputated by chopping them off and plunging the stump in hot pitch. Gunshot wounds are treated by a poultice of dates, onions and tamarind.

From the day of its arrival in the Persian Gulf, the Arabian Mission has carried on dispensaries. At Busrah, Dr. H. R. L. Worrall has, for six years, treated thousands of the sick and traveled hundreds of miles in touring with medicines. At Bahrein, Dr. S. J. Thoms and Mrs. Thoms, both graduates from the medical department of the University of Michigan, are in charge of medical work. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar with their names and faces. The medical work here has now a bright prospect before it. Thanks to the liberality of the Mason family, of the Dutch Reformed Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., a large and well-equipped Memorial Hospital was built on the island of Bahrein. The location is central, and patients come from the mainland as well as from the many villages around. These islands have a population of 60,000, and are in close commercial touch with all Eastern Arabia. The hospital was a direct answer to prayer and supplied a great need. Building began in February, 1902, and, by hard effort, was completed before the end of the year. When the corner stone was laid, a large number of Arabs were present, and it was an impressive occasion. On Sunday, January 25th, the building was dedicated to God, in the name of Jesus Christ. Our prayer then and now is that this building may prove not only a Bethesda but a Bethel. Last year our medical missionaries, even without the facilities of the hospital, treated over 15,000 patients. The hospital measures 68 x 100 feet, and has room on the lower floor for a men's and women's dispensary, chapels and consulting rooms. Upstairs are the wards and operating rooms. The cost of supporting a bed is about thirty-five dollars per annum. Further information of the work can be had from the Secretary of the Arabian Mission, 25 East Twenty-second street, New York City. The Rev. John G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides, whose gospel ministry among the islanders of the Pacific is one of the brightest pages of Christian effort in a century, sends us the following letter:

NAVAL HEROES

TEXT—ISA. 33: 21: Neither shall gallant ship pass thereby

THE old Brooklyn Navy Yard used to have many interesting sights. There were its museum and its antiquated cannon mounted in the yards, and its piles of empty shells. There were its famous dry dock, and the great sheds under which lay the keels and the skeleton ribs of those massive frames that were laid and knit together toward the close of the Civil War, but never finished. There were, also, its uniformed sailors and marines, and its buildings, filled with food and clothing, soon to be sent to the different naval stations of the world. There often lay the training ships and the great men-of-war, just in from foreign ports. But to me, the most interesting place of all in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, where I used to play as a boy, was "Rotten Row." Alongside of its wharves were tied some of the decaying vessels that had helped to make America's valor respected and admired around the world. These ships were too old to voyage the sea and too weak to defy the enemy's shells. They were also too sacred to be split up for kindling. There they lay, with a sentimental, but not an intrinsic value. Their decks were deserted, their hulls empty, their masts cut down. But there they floated at the docks, magnificent reminders of a glorious past.

Isaiah has been walking in imagination along the "Rotten Row" of a millennial dawn. With prophetic vision, he has been looking ahead to the time when all the navies of the world shall go out of commission; when every quarter-deck of every man-of-war shall be a playground for the pattering feet of the little children; when the war-ships' decks shall no longer be slippery with human blood. "Neither shall gallant ship pass thereby," translated into the language of ordinary life, means, "Neither shall gallant men-of-war ever again sail to destroy life." And yet, Isaiah, speaking of this gladsome day, cannot refrain from paying a well-earned compliment to those patriotic sailors who have always been willing to fight, and, if necessary, to die for their country's cause. He speaks of the man-of-war in words of martial praise. He calls the naval vessel a "gallant ship."

Gallant Deeds of the Navy

Ought the "jack tars" of old to be more honored than those of the present time? Cannot we afford, on this "Memorial Sunday," to praise the heroic deeds of American "blue jackets" who fought under John Jones in the Ranger, and the Bon Homme Richard, under Captain Hill in the Constitution, under James Lawrence in the Chesapeake, under Decatur in the United States, under Farragut in the Hartford, under Dewey in the Olympia. If the most conspicuous monument in all London was reared in Trafalgar Square, to the memory of Admiral Nelson, surely we, on this last Sabbath preceding our annual Memorial Day, should dedicate at least one sermon to the noble tars who, in the American wars, won immortal fame upon the high seas. "Gallant ships" is a term we can well apply to the great number of man-of-war vessels which have composed the American Navy from 1776 down to the present time.

The American Navy was always willing to fight our wars with the material it had on hand. Its officers in the past did not first estimate the strength of the enemy. They gathered together what vessels and men they could, and then they went forth to battle, no matter how great the odds were against them. We are all able to recognize this kind of valor, when it is found beating under the breast of an American. When, some years ago, a tourist was being shown about the heights of Quebec, a French guide tauntingly said, "And these are the cannon we captured on Bunker Hill." "Yes," answered the American, "you got the guns, but we have the hill. And we finally got possession of Bunker Hill with soldiers who wore no uniform, and, for the most part, had no military education. We won with farmers' boys, led by farmers like Putnam and Nat Green." But is the Revolutionary soldiers' bravery to be praised more than that of the Revolutionary sailors? Was George Washington crossing the Delaware a more glorious figure than Captain Jones standing upon the deck of the Bon Homme Richard and fighting on, until his own ship was a wreck; and then, when the Serapis had struck her colors, sailing away in the captured prize, while his own ship with a swift plunge went down to a watery grave?

Then passing by the war of 1812, and the deeds of Perry and Decatur, we would come down to the war of 1861. We would speak, in the same breath, of the deeds of the Northern and Southern sailors. We certainly were brothers before the war; we have been brothers since the war; we were brothers during the war, though for that short time we had a family difference. Was there ever a braver deed recorded than when Commodore Franklin Buchanan steered the Confederate Merrimac into Hampton Roads to give battle to the whole Federal fleet? You must remember that this kind of a vessel had never yet been tested, and her armament had already been condemned by the naval experts as dangerous and of little use. Then after the Merrimac in one day had sunk the Cumberland, and disabled the Congress, and run the Minnesota aground, was there ever a braver sight than when the little bandbox Monitor, seemingly a mere toy, went forth as a shepherd boy to meet this mighty naval Goliath? Then after the Merrimac and the Monitor had been supposed to render useless all the wooden ships as men-of-war, was there ever a grander sight than when old Admiral David Farragut, sixty-five years of age, lashed in the riggings of the old Hartford, led his wooden ships past forts supposed to be impassable, over waters invested with torpedoes, into Mobile Bay, where lay the ironclad Tennessee, black-grimed and merciless, ready to demolish what might escape the deadly fire of the forts? Yes, such mighty deeds have always crowded the pages of our naval history. In no case can it be said that the American navy was ever unwilling to fight its country's battles with the material it had on hand.

An Example to All

Are you and I ready to do the duties that arise before us, day by day, as promptly and unquestioningly as the American Navy as a whole, did its duty? Are we ready to go forth bravely, and cheerfully, no matter how weak may seem to be our mental, physical, and spiritual equipment? Do you not know that your very confidence in yourselves, and your willingness to go ahead, means already the battle half won? When Lieutenant Dupont was commanded to do a certain thing, at first he failed to carry out his orders. Returning to Admiral Farragut, he began to make many excuses for his failure. But the great Admiral turned and said: "Ah, Dupont, you have not given me the chief excuse for your failure. You did not accomplish what I told you to do chiefly because, deep down in your heart, you did not think you could do it." "Then, if that be true," said the young sailor, "I will go ahead and carry out your orders." And go he did. Are not our failures, my hearers, due to a like cause? If we had the faith in God that we ought to have, should we not accomplish more? "I can do all things," said the intrepid Apostle, "through Christ who strengtheneth me." Sure of that strength he went into the conflict with undaunted courage, and his enemies declared that he turned the world upside down. So it has ever been with the missionaries and the reformers. They who dared, confident of divine support, returned as victors. That strength is still given to all who depend upon it. You and I may have it, and it will enable us to perform any task allotted to us, if we will only, like the American sailor, go forth to fulfil it strong in faith, and with a good heart.

But the American Navy has also been willing at all times to do its routine work, as well as to unlimber its batteries and clear its decks in time of conflict. There is something inspiring, something terrific and overwhelming, in the thought of two great naval monsters coming closer and closer together, to grapple in mortal combat. What man is there whose cheek does not flush when he hears about the duel of the Constitution and the Guerriere? What American's eye does not flash when he sees Commodore Hull commanding his flag officer, Lieutenant Morris, to withhold the fire of his gunners until the two vessels were within speaking distance, then, with cannon double-shotted, to send forth their messengers of death?

In the Great War

So, in the Civil War, the victories of Gen. Grant would never have been won had he not had the assistance of the American sailor, as well of the soldier in blue. The value of the services the sailors rendered in that awful conflict cannot be exaggerated. It was they who intercepted the supplies that the Southern armies so sorely needed. It was their vigilance that produced the destitution, which not even the sublime self-sacrifice of the Southern people could relieve. Day in and day out, year in and year out, the northern ships blockaded the Southern ports. The Southern armies were more starved to death than they were shot to pieces by the Federal guns. The Southern soldiers could not buy shoes for their feet, or clothing for their backs, or blankets for their camps, or medicines for their sick. The patriotic women of the South had to tear up their linen dresses, that the surgeons might have bandages for the bleeding wounds. Tea and coffee were banished from the Southern tables during those sad years. In all the pages of history, you cannot find any nobler record of self-denial and suffering than that of the Southern lady and the soldier in gray in 1862–64, caused for the most part by the poverty resulting from that inexorable naval blockade. As I said before, the Southern Confederacy was simply starved to death by the routine work of the American Navy. Grant and Lee, Sherman and Johnson, and Thomas and Hood, Sheridan and Longstreet, won immortal fame upon the land. Yet, very few people have stopped to give due credit to the faithful naval officers and sailors who uncomplainingly sailed backward and forward in front of Charleston and Savannah and the other Southern harbors.

Faithful in Small Things

Let us ask ourselves if we are ready to do the necessary routine work of our lives, as the American sailors in the past have been ready to do theirs? David Farragut had to wait until he was over sixty years of age before he had an opportunity to distinguish himself in battle. If the great American naval officer could patiently, uncomplainingly and faithfully perform the humbler duties of daily life until he was an old man, near to the grave, surely we can afford to be brave and true in the inconspicuous duties God has given us to do.

The American Navy should be honored. Upon its glorious muster-roll are to be found the names of international statesmen, as well as heroic fighters—men who have brilliantly served our country with brain and pen as well as with the sword. Many of our Presidents have been elected to the White House on account of their military records. Washington and Taylor, and Jackson, and William H. Harrison, and Grant, and Hayes, and Garfield are among the number. But the American soldier rarely has the opportunity to study statecraft, as has the sailor. It was only comparatively a few years ago that foreign lands were brought into cable touch with our national capital. Thus every naval ship which touched a foreign port not only had to have a captain who could sail the seas, but also a naval diplomat, who, independent of the Home Government, had to decide many questions which, wrongly decided, might involve his country in international strife.

Naval Statesmen.

Our national indebtedness to our Navy is not confined to its prowess in battle. We owe much to the tact and statesmanship of our naval commanders. They have not only to uphold the honor of our flag in distant seas, but to display the courtesy and consideration to the navies of other nations which are necessary to the maintenance of friendly relations. It would have been possible for Admiral Dewey, by an indiscreet act while he lay in Manila Bay, to have involved us in an international quarrel. Thousands of miles away from home, by one false move, he could have made Germany an enemy, and involved us in war with Emperor William. Had he been careless there might have ensued a scramble on the part of other nations to gain possession of some of the Philippine Islands for themselves. There was similar danger in the Hawaiian difficulty. During all the negotiations over the Hawaiian Islands, there lay the American war-ship Philadelphia, by careful diplomacy compelling the foreign governments to keep their hands off, until at last the American flag flew from above the Ex-Queen's throne-room. What honor is too great for the memory of Commodore Matthew C. Perry, who in March, 1852, negotiated the famous treaty with Japan, which, for the first time, opened the ports of the Mikado to the ships from other lands? Incident after incident could be cited where the American sailor has won imperishable laurels in preventing war, rather than in winning prizes after a war has been started.

Naval Explorers

Our American Navy has defied the severity of the elements, as well as the storm of shot and shell. I am not now speaking of the hurricanes which blow over the Atlantic or the Pacific. I have in mind the frigid terrors of the far North, which Captain D. L. Braine defied when he tried to find the Arctic Pole in 1873, and Lieutenant-Commander George Washington De Long defied when he led the fatal Jeanette expedition in 1879. Ah, those were brave men, yet no braver than General Greely, and Rear Admiral Melville, and the many gallant fellows who went after the De Long party, and faced icy dangers to bring back the survivors and the frozen bodies of the dead.

Does any one say that all this sacrifice of heroic naval lives to the Northern elements is a useless sacrifice? I do not think so. As a young boy, I saw the long procession of hearses that carried many of the dead of the ill-fated De Long expedition out to their last resting-place. All honor to those brave men! May such men ever be found serving in the American Navy—men who, in the cause of science or of patriotism, count not their lives dear unto them, but go fearlessly into danger that they may win honor for their flag. May there ever be, too, in Christ's service men of similar fibre—bold to seek the truth wherever it may be found, and fearless in declaring it, though they have to encounter the frigid hostility of friends and the virulent hatred of foes.

The American Navy is to be honored to-day. The

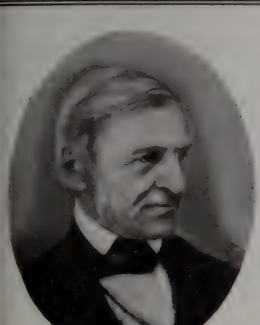
Emerson's Memorial Day

The Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of "The Sage of Concord"



RALPH WALDO EMERSON

LESS than a quarter of a century ago we still had our great prophet-philosopher among us. We cannot, therefore, quite reconcile ourselves to the celebration of the centenary, which seems to put him far back in history. Yet we do well to honor his memory, and need no apology for seizing on this occasion of the hundredth anniversary of his birth to pay a tribute to his genius. We have a right to be proud of him, for he most thoroughly identified himself with us, and he won for us in circles of scholars and thinkers, the world over, a respect never before given to our national character. In all lands our sewing-machines and other labor-saving inventions were appreciated and turned to account, and men's eyes were directed to this country with the expectation of new mechanical achievements and ingenious applications of natural forces to utilitarian purposes. It was supposed that we were a nation of materialists, with no thought higher than new patent and the acquisition of a colossal fortune. Nothing could have surprised the world more than the appearance on this side the Atlantic of a philosopher of the type of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Men were used to the idea of the young giant of the West taking a foremost place in the world of mechanical devices, but they were amazed to hear the clarion note of a declaration of spiritual and mental independence. It announced that the sluggard intellect of America was about "to look from under its iron lids and fill the postponed expectation of the world with something better than the exertions of mechanical skill. Our day of dependence," the voice declared, "our long apprenticeship to the learning of other lands, draws to a close. We will walk on our own feet; we will work with our own hands; we will speak our own minds. A nation of men will for the first time exist, because each believes himself inspired by the divine soul which inspires all souls." Men listened in admiring wonder, and soon he whom they named "the Yankee Plato" had an audience in every land.

To the outer world the rising of the new luminary was sudden and startling. Here, there had been signs of its coming brilliance, but not all of them perceptible to ordinary minds. In truth, there were many who formed gloomy ideas of its future, and to this day see only defects and deformities in it. For Emerson was not cast in the common mold, and by those who recognize beauty and force only when they appear in regular and orthodox form, he was unappreciated. Orthodox minds, especially, were shocked by his frank explanations of his reason for quitting the ministry. His father had been a minister in the Congregational Church and, stretching far back to his ancestor Peter Bulkeley, who, in 1634, crossed the sea with his church members and settled at Concord, Mass., every generation had been represented in the pulpit. When Ralph was born, on May 25, 1803, in spite of poverty and hardship, it was a matter of course that he should go to Harvard and be a minister. He fulfilled his destiny so far that, in 1829, he was the ordained minister of a Boston church. High hopes were entertained of him, and people listened in delight to his original discourses. They differed from others in their style. They were not closely reasoned, logical, well-rounded productions, but a succession of brilliant flashes, epigrams, and pregnant passages, the meaning of which he was at no pains to elaborate. It was as if he had been privileged to see things which it was not lawful for man to utter. He spoke like one of the old Hebrew prophets, giving no reasons for his declarations, but stating them as one who had seen a truth and announced it. To many of his hearers it recalled the old Gospel description of the teaching of the Master: "He taught as one having authority and not as the scribes." But after a brief service of only three and a half years there was disappointment and sorrow. Emerson could no longer act and preach in accord with the doctrines and practices of his church, and so, with mutual regret and good-will, his resignation was tendered and accepted.

Thus early—he was only thirty years of age—it seemed as if all his opportunity of serving his generation had closed. But his real work was only just beginning. He went to Europe, had his memorable conferences with Carlyle, and came back to deliver his own message free of all control and untrammeled by ecclesiastical tradition. He hired a hall in Boston, and every year delivered a series of lectures, which he afterwards carefully revised and collected in a book. Thus appeared: Nature; Representative Men; English Traits; The Conduct of Life; Society and Solitude; Letters and Social Aims; and Biographical Sketches; besides two volumes of Essays. His audiences grew, and the circle of his readers, here and in foreign lands, enlarged. It was not easy always to grasp his meaning, for he counted on a perception in his readers like his own, and that could not be found fully in any soul. But even the partial apprehension of his utterances was inspiring, and those who incorporated in their lives the passages they did understand, found that the mystery lifted from others that were dark. He was emphatically, as Matthew Arnold described him, "The friend and aider of those who would live in the Spirit." He formulated no school of philosophy; there were no followers who could group themselves into a society which they could call by his name; but everywhere there were men who were influenced by his incisive words and had received into their souls from his lips, seed thoughts which germinated in heart and life. It was saddening to Christian souls of those times, as it is to us in these days, that a religion which speaks the same truths, in other forms, could not have continued to count him among its advocates. In cutting loose from orthodox Christianity he added nothing to the value of his teaching and he made no beneficent use of the liberty that he gained. Christ's own problem, "What shall a man profit though he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" was ever at the base of Emerson's thought. He read it in nature and in human life, and in varied forms he was always uttering it. His life was in accord with his teaching. Happily and tranquilly he passed his years at Concord, making regular lecturing tours but returning gladly to his study and his books and the friends whom he loved. So he drifted quietly into the evening of life, and on April 27, 1882, passed into the skies.

genius of its constructors and the sure marksmanship of its gunners are to be the great preventers of future wars. The President of the United States a short time ago when speaking in the city of Chicago, said practically these words: "Do not boast in reference to our national prowess. Let us obey the old adage which says, 'Speak softly, but carry a big club, and go ahead.'" The big club to-day, for national offense and defense, is the American Navy. More and more has the law of national development increased the responsibility of the navy. A hostile fleet lying outside New York, Boston, Charleston or San Francisco, could, by a few hours bombardment, exact a ransom of fabulous amount, unless we had a fleet to defend our ports. For our national safety, for the very preservation of our national existence, we need strong ships and brave men to man them. Let us then by the honors that we pay to the naval heroes of the past encourage their successors.

But now, the genius of the American naval constructor has been at work. We see the glittering uniforms of the American naval officers standing upon the decks of the New York, Chicago, Iowa, Brooklyn, Texas, Oregon, Olympia, Massachusetts, Illinois, New Maine, and Philadelphia, and the great fleets of other warships which now compose our Navy, and all the many other warships soon to be built and put into commission. Under present conditions, the only way to prevent war is to be strong for national defense. It is only for a time. The Gospel is eventually to permeate all nations and bring every government into subjection to the Prince of Peace. When that glorious day comes our battleships may be dismantled, and instead of guns and armaments of war they may sail forth bearing Bibles and missionaries, or food for some famine-stricken people.

But there is another reason for honoring the American Navy. We honor it for the lives of its Christian men, both in sailors' bunk and officers' cabin, whose influence has permeated the whole service. Some people are apt to think of the American sailors as a cursing, lying, drinking, carousing lot. That is not true. Some of the noblest of Christians have worn the naval uniform. Did ever a Christian write a more beautiful letter than this, which Admiral Farragut wrote to his wife, the night before the battle of Mobile Bay? "My dearest wife: I write and leave this letter to you. I am going into Mobile Bay in the morning, if God is my leader, and I hope he is, and in him I place my trust. If he thinks it is the proper place for me to die, I am ready to submit to his will, in that, as in all other things. God bless and preserve you, my darling, and my dear boy, if anything should happen to me." Was there ever a sweeter Christian character than Commodore Philip, who was once Captain Philip, of the Texas. He was brave enough before Santiago, when Cervera's fleet was going down, to call out to his victorious men: "Don't cheer, boys. Those poor fellows over there are dying." And he was brave enough, after the battle was ended, to call his men together, and have the ship's chaplain return thanks to that God who had preserved the American ships in the battle. During the weary blockade off Santiago, the Commander of the American fleet, Admiral William T. Sampson, was seen again and again to kneel by his berth in prayer. All through the forecastle, as well as the officers' quarters of the American Navy, there have always been praying men. They have realized their need of wisdom, and have gone to the Divine Source; they have known the weakness of their moral nature, and have sought the help of Him who is able to keep them in temptation; they have learned how liable they are to sudden death in wreck or in battle, and they have committed their souls to Christ. Their needs are ours; we, too, in the voyage of life, must have Divine succor lest we make shipwreck. The same Ear is open to our supplication. With them, and for them, let us bow at the Throne of Grace.

Thus I have two purposes in preaching this sermon. The one is, to show what our naval heroes have done. While the flowers of this Memorial Day are being placed upon the soldiers' graves, I would have you remember the heroes whose bodies lie in unknown sepulchres beneath the blue waters of the deep. We can lay no flowers on their resting-place, but in our hearts we can do them honor and by our gratitude keep their memory green. My second purpose is to remind you of the duties we owe to God and our country. This land, in defense of which the naval heroes laid down their lives, is a sacred heritage. Its honor, its principles, its best interests are in our keeping. Their sacrifice will go for naught if we allow our country to drift into infidelity and sin. Only by righteousness can we live for the Divine protection. Let us every one do our part in our several positions to make our beloved country, which is consecrated by the lives and deaths of these heroes, a God-fearing, God-serving nation.

ON THE ROAD TO KAJANI

THE FARM FENCES IN FINLAND LIE SLANTING

SLEIGHING ACROSS A FROZEN LAKE

IN THE CENTRE OF THE FAMINE

By DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH

III.—In Kajani

AT the close of my last letter, I stated that in this we would travel from Kajani to Uleaborg, but I fear it will be impossible to carry out this programme without omitting many incidents that made our experience peculiarly interesting. These, however, I may supply at the close of this series in supplementary letters, as opportunity may be presented. I shall endeavor now to cover the ground, giving only such typical cases as will enable the reader to form an intelligent idea of the condition of North Finland as we found it during our never-to-be-forgotten trip among the famine sufferers of that unhappy, yet surpassingly beautiful country.

Good Pastor Wayrynen

Kajani is the very centre of the famine district, and until recently its neighboring villages were in such a deplorable condition, that even at the present moment, the heart of the writer is filled with sadness as he recalls the distressing scenes he was called upon there to witness. The district comprises 25,000 square kilometres, or about 9,000 square miles, and contains nine churches, or one for every one thousand square miles. Pastor Wayrynen is the head of the Lutheran Church for the district, and a more sincere, thoroughly consecrated and utterly self-sacrificing pastor, I have rarely if ever met. His life is entirely given up to his people, and his one thought is how to improve their condition spiritually and temporally. He is a tall, pleasant-looking, dark-complexioned personage, with a solemn, serious face, lighted up now and then by a genial smile, as though to indicate his ability to enter into the more agreeable phases of life, when conditions are such as to warrant it. He was dressed in regulation clerical garb, and greeted us with great cordiality. With much feeling he explained to us the condition of his people, of whom 33 per cent. were in direful straits. At that time he was personally looking after 175 families, in the immediate vicinity, who were almost entirely dependent on charity. A remarkable peculiarity of his, is his utter inability to speak German or to understand English, yet being able to understand the former and speak the latter. It was therefore necessary to put all our questions in German and get our answers in English. Some time ago sickness was in his family, and he sat up nights watching the patient, studying English in the intervals from a grammar, without a teacher. Thus he learned to speak it, rather mechanically, but as no one speaks English to him, his ear has never become accustomed to the sound of the language as spoken by others.

While we were arranging our plans, the village choir assembled in the dining-room and began to sing. One of the leaders addressed me in Finnish, to which I replied in English, Dr. Reuter, as usual, acting as interpreter. As they filed out I shook hands with all of them, about fifty in number, and thanked them individually. Two hours later, at 11:30 just as I was about to finish a letter which I had begun on my arrival earlier in the evening, a dozen men with superb voices, assembled under my bedroom window, and sang a most lovely lullaby. I rolled up the shades, but finding the double windows hermetically sealed and carefully pasted up with strips of paper, as is customary in Finland, I took a lighted candle in each hand, and lifting it up and down, manifested my appreciation of the compliment.

THE YOUNG MEN WHO SANG TO US AT KAJANI

Although on the morrow Pastor Wayrynen had to prepare two sermons for his people for the day following, he cheerfully volunteered his services as escort to the neighboring villages, and every hour endeared him more and more to our hearts. The son of a peasant, he had made his way through college, and now ministered to the very class of people among whom he had spent his early days. He knew and understood them thoroughly—told us of their simple life, their firm, unwavering faith in God, their unswerving honesty, their utter unselfishness, and their readiness to share the last morsel of bread with a suffering neighbor. He particularly dwelt on their abstinence from intoxicants. In the entire district, embracing 49,000 souls, there was only one tavern, and even that was meeting with but indifferent success; and incidentally he remarked that there were only two physicians, and mentally we considered whether there was not a very close connection between these two circumstances.

He said that the Finns were so intensely and consistently religious, that many a time when, throughout the entire week, heavy rains interfered with the gathering of the slim crop that had survived here and there the untimely snows, and Sunday's sun shone brightly, and the cool drying breezes would invite an effort to save what might still be saved, the Finns steadfastly and almost without exception refused to do manual labor on the Lord's Day, preferring to lose what was left rather than do anything their consciences could not approve.

Wherever we called, Pastor Wayrynen spoke words of comfort and encouragement to the parents, patted the children, and left, with our loaves and marks, some illustrated books of Bible stories. He inquired carefully into the deportment of the children and into their progress at school, stopping now and then to hear a child read, in order to ascertain for himself whether or not the headway was satisfactory. All the children love him dearly and he loves the children. God bless him!

FLOUR FOR THE FAMINE SUFFERERS

According to all reports and my personal observations, the shadow of famine reached the very doors and darkened the interior of tens of thousands of Finnish homes; but while want as a grim spectre sat at the table, an unwelcome guest, death from starvation, technically speaking, claimed no victims, but nevertheless the rate of mortality was largely increased, due to anæmia, ulcers, pneumonia, intestinal disorders, and numerous other ailments, induced by fearful impoverishment of the blood, a condition which we were about to meet in nearly every cottage between Kajani and Uleaborg.

The first thing I learned the next day was the greeting customary in Finland on meeting one another in the morning, The first one to speak says: "Hyvaa Paivaa," which means good day, and the other responds reverently: "Jumala Antakoon," or God grant it. Three sledges started out that morning from Kajani on their errand of mercy—one contained all the bread the local bakery could supply. It was hot and aromatic when we received it, but the chilling breezes soon rendered it as cold as its surroundings. Our first stop was at Kirkkoaho, and here we visited all the different cottages within the radius of time and opportunity. Everywhere the same scenes of utter destitution confronted us and we could not fail to notice a universal condition of nervousness, begotten of a continuous feeling of uncertainty concerning the next meal of black bread and water. And here, for the first time, we met one of the most touching sights we were thereafter frequently called upon to encounter. I refer to infants extracting nourishment from "Sugar Plums," made of hunger-bread tied up in the corner of a napkin and dipped in salt water. Mothers will understand why some of us shed tears when we saw it.

Aged Sufferers

In one cottage we found a grandfather of eighty, his daughter-in-law suffering from dropsy, the result of improper nourishment, and her five pale-faced children dressed in rags and possessed of only one pair of dilapidated shoes, to be worn in turns as occasion might demand. The old man, his son and their only horse were toiling hard for fifty cents a day, and it took twenty cents a day to feed the horse—netting eight people only thirty cents. In the barn we found the one cow that had not yet been killed, so weak that it could not stand. And yet this family was considered so well-to-do as compared with others, that we hesitated to give them tokens. But when at last we placed the coin in the hands of the old gentleman he could hardly realize it, and passed it to his sick daughter-in-law, who, bursting into tears, cried out, "Surely God must be thinking of us."

Driving to another cottage, twelve kilometres, or seven miles distant, we met a funeral cortege on sledges, coming from the opposite direction. The path across the snow was too narrow to admit of our passing each other. The first sledge bore a white ribbon, which indicated the presence of the dead. In this instance it was the body of a child—a girl of eleven ere "the Americans," and the cortege was bout to be obligingly directed into the epths of the snow, at the side of the oad, when we insisted that the right of ay should be granted to the mourners. ut owing to the narrowness of the road, his could not be accomplished without psetting both parties, so we all got out, nharnessed the horses, and bodily lifted he sledges around each other. Inside of en minutes the funeral procession con-nued one way, and we the other.

Hardships of the Children

The cottage we stopped at contained a amily consisting of a very tall and pain-ully thin woman and her six children. The husband was away in the tar country, orking hard, and in two weeks he had een able to send them only twenty-five ennies or five cents, all he had been able o save. In the next cottage we found a nother and five children—one nursling, all artly naked—not a pair of shoes and not bed in the house—absolutely destitute nd more miserable than any I had seen ince I left the hospitable shores of our wn lovely land. The husband was away orking for the rent—and of course not ontributing to their support. As all the anitary arrangements in this part of Fin-nd are quite a distance from the house, he suffering of the children, walking bare-ooted over the sharp ice-crusted snow wenty to thirty inches in depth, an under-aking which even the half-starved wolves f the neighborhood dare not venture—ay be imagined but not described. So reat was the dearth of food, that the fowls nd hares had died off in such quantities s to infect the neighborhood with a sick-ning disease and death-dealing stench.

At Jorma, the next village, we found simi-ar conditions existing, and after visiting everal cottages, tired, weary and heart-sick, e turned back and reached the hotel long fter darkness had set in, but two hours arlier than we had considered possible, hich we effected by urging our drivers on to the utmost speed by the use of a ew Finnish words that seemed to potent-y appeal to them. One was "Vikkelaan," he other "Sukkelaan," both meaning hurry, nd these again were backed up with "Coxsy Markka," which meant a gratuity f two marks, or forty cents each. They aid nothing, but hurried on, and brought us ome as quickly as the horses would travel. The Finns generally are a people of but ew words. A country like theirs, with ong winter nights and eight months of eep snow, with nothing visible for miles t a time but spectral and silent pine groups, is not conducive to vivacity of spirits and great loquacity. Then again, he leaden skies all through the winter are pt to depress the spirits and make the people deliberate of both speech and action.

At the hotel we found, as usual, an array of supplicants. We listened to them in-dividually, and offered in each instance such assistance as seemed best adapted to that particular case. The next day—the Sabbath—we rested, but still con-tinued to listen to personal appeals, and respond as intelligently and liberally as circumstances permitted. In the evening the heads of the local Relief Committee called, and presented me with an extensive document, expressing the heartfelt thanks of the people of the Kajani District to the noble, generous and sympathetic Ameri-can friends, who had come to the relief of Finland when it was suffering from fam-ine and political oppression. I thanked them heartily, and expressed the hope that henceforth Finland and America would be bound by ties of brotherly love, that would ever keep alive such active sympathy and friendship as hereafter would deeply interest the one in the spiritual, temporal and politi-cal welfare of the other.

Saturday a telegram was received, inform-ing me that His Majesty, the Emperor of Russia, had consented to grant me an audience, when I returned to St. Petersburg. I could not do so immediately, without disarranging our plans for the balance of the cam-paign. I therefore wired a reply, to the effect that on Monday morning we were to re-sume our sledge tour through the interior, and that on our arrival at Uleaborg I would wire again. Monday morning early we started out, stopping first at the house of a tenant-farmer, who happened also to be a shoemaker. He had a wife and seven chil-dren, clad in rags, yet very neat and clean. He was a bright-faced man, who, notwith-standing his terrible poverty, kept up a not hold the pencil, but as our experi-ences were almost entirely on the line of those already related, but little if anything of interest was passed. On the way, how-ever, I learned that the consumption of liquors of all kinds for the nearly 9,000 inhabitants of Kajani averaged fifty pen-nies, or ten cents per head a year, and much of that was used for sick cattle. As there is only one veterinary surgeon in the entire dis-trict, and hence professional treatment is ex-ceptional, per-haps even that much liquor is misapplied. I remember, however, very distinctly the stop we made at a cottage in Mainna, where we met a black-smith, em-ployed in Pal-tamo, near Kajani, and his wife and six children. Here one of our party broke down, so overcome was he at the sad sights he wit-nessed. The en-tire family slept on the bare ground. The man's earnings amounted to his own board and forty pennies, or eight cents a day. Hunger had so wrought on the physique of the fam-ily that they were dreadfully attenuated, yet their faces and their stomachs abnor-mally bloated. We asked him if there was anything we could do for him. "No," he replied, "our wants are few and we need nothing." But down the hill a mile away we learned that for two days they had been without bread—probably because the house was almost inaccessible. Here, as in many another place, there was much want, but little weeping. If others did not plead their case, these people might starve, but they would not beg.

A PEASANT AND HIS CHILDREN

Arriving in sight of another practically inaccessible cottage, we got out, and walked very carefully over the unbroken snow; but soon the crust gave way, and we sank at every step beyond our knees. We were almost discouraged and ready to abandon the effort, when a hand-sledge, pushed by a boy, came in our direction. He had been sent out to take us, but only one could ride. The others all insisting on it, I took he seat, and was pushed along, but the boy's strength gave out, and a man came to help us. It was slow and laborious traveling, but at last I reached the house. In course of time the others also arrived. Seven children, nearly starved, was the sight that greeted us. They had not had a warm meal since last fall. Supplying their own wants, we left with them six loaves and five marks for a needy family beyond our reach. Tears trickled down the mother's cheeks, who prayed hyster-ically that God might speedily relieve or end their terrible sufferings.

While sad and distressing scenes abounded everywhere, no such pic-ture cannot be accorded the intelligent and thoughtful relief measures introduced by the Committee in charge of this work. Many cottages contained contented and happy families, kept busy and cheerful by home employment, destined to those who had it laid upon their hearts to relieve heartfelt suffering and to stay the relentless hand of death. Letters were being oper-ated by the women, fishing nets made by the children, woolen mats manu-factured by the men, and expended pack-ages containing bread always kicked in. In one hut, with a large hole in the centre, gave evidence that industry, made pos-sible by the thoughtfulness of those entrusted with relief operations, was pro-viding the staff of life for multitudes who, but for these measures, must long ere this have filled an untimely grave.

The Committee's Good Work

Those who failed to participate in the beneficent results of the Committee's plans had been either too proud to make their needs public, or had only recently reached the point where they were abso-lutely destitute, and until that point is reached, it seems unlikely that a Finn would beg.

But without the help of the good peo-ple of this country, what the outcome would have been is difficult to imagine—the scenes of 1868, when a hundred thou-sand perished, must have been repeated, and the story of Finland's sufferings would have passed into the horrors of the twentieth century.

At midnight we arrived at Ransila. The post house had only one room to spare. There were two beds. Two of us occupied these, and two, including the writer, slept on the floor. The windows, sealed as usual, kept out even the suspicion of fresh air, and the atmosphere, consequently, was almost intolerable. The next day we visited Saraisniemi, and here we met the stout heart. Although very industrious and hard working, he had only been able to earn twenty five marks, or five dollars, since Dec. 1. We gave him some money, and asked him what he would do with it. He replied that he would buy salt. The bread, he said, was very unpalatable without salt, and hereafter he could dip it in salted water.

At Mattila we found in one of the cot-tages a desperately sick man with his wife, and a daughter of eighteen with a nursling of ten months. The whole family slept on the floor of a hut nine by eleven feet. The father, whose feet were dread-fully swollen from dropsy resulting from famine conditions, was a man of great faith. Throughout the fearfully trying ordeal which they were undergoing, he believed that he discerned the chastening hand of Providence, to which he submis-sively bowed head and heart, confident that God in his own time and his own way would deliver them from the fearful fate that stared them boldly and defiantly in the face.

After leaving Kajani the thermometer dropped to ten degrees below zero, and I found it quite impossible to take notes. Even a few moments with the gloves off numbed the fingers so that they could worst destitution in all Finland. Perhaps on some other occasion I may revert to it, as I surely shall to certain Children's Homes and Industrial Schools under the efficient superintendency of our com-panion, Mr. Robert Alopaeus; but in order to reach Uleaborg, I must hasten on. We left Helsingfors March 2, and it was March 13 when, to our great joy, we again saw railroad tracks at Liminka. Here an ovation awaited us. The public evening school had arranged a reception. The scholars, young men and women, all peas-ants, sang for us, and the principal made a very eulogistic address in German. He almost exhausted his vocabulary in search for fitting terms to express his gratitude to each and every contributor to the Fund that had saved his people from death. I responded in an address in German, at first directed to the school and then to the principal, congratulating him on the ses-sion to which he had evidently been provi-dentially called. At 7 P. M. we took the train. A great host had gathered at the depot, and song followed song until the train drew out, landing us, at 8 o'clock in the evening, safe and sound, without a mishap, providentially preserved, at Uleaborg, the most northerly city of the world and our point of destination.

AT this time, when so many are making shorter or longer voyages on ocean, lake, and river, it will be fitting to consider how we can make this lesson impressive to the sailors we meet—three millions of them in the world, it is said—and to all others journeying with us in the voyage of life, a journey that we are ever making, even when we sleep on land, as the traveler journeys while he sleeps at sea. Every morning we wake nearer to our final port.

Nearer the bound of life, where we lay our burdens down.
Nearer leaving the Cross, nearer wearing the crown.

Embarking in a ship . . . we put to sea (27: 2). Let the start of Paul's voyage at Cesarea picture the beginning of life's voyage in the cradle. Well may we write upon the little bark the Breton boatman's prayer: "Keep me, my God, my boat is so small and the ocean is so wide."

Touched at Sidon and gave him leave to go unto his friends and refresh himself (v. 3). This pictures one of the many glad times in the voyage of life, especially in its early part.

The winds were contrary (v. 4).—In every voyage of life contrary winds are encountered. "Into every life some rain must fall." It would be as bad for the soul as for soil were it not so. The contrary winds, too, have their purpose. We are the better for buffeting them. Struggle is the way to strength.

We had sailed slowly many days (v. 7).—To be becalmed or almost so is hardly less trying than to be swept forward with perilous speed by a gale. We need patience to bear the slow days, when hopes deferred make the heart sick, or when our plans are but tardily and imperfectly realized.

The wind not further suffering us . . . with difficulty coasting along (vs. 7, 8).—Here, again, the obstacles that every life must encounter are pictured. We cannot always go where and when we would, and often can go only with difficulty.

The voyage was now dangerous (v. 9).—Not difficulties alone but real dangers are to be encountered. Would that the young in beginning life's voyage would realize that their greatest dangers will come from winds of anger and passion, and from rocks of selfishness and appetite, and especially from little sins that often cause great wrecks. Once a ship was wrecked on the Irish coast. The captain was a careful one. Nor had the weather been of so severe a kind as to explain the wide distance to which the vessel had swerved from her proper course. The ship went down, but so much of interest attached to the disaster that a diving-bell was sunk. Among other portions of the vessel which were examined was the compass, which was swung on deck; and inside the compass-box was detected a bit of steel, which appeared to be the small point of a pocket-knife blade. It appeared that the day before the wreck a sailor had been sent to clean the compass, had used his pocket-knife in the process, and had unconsciously broken off the point, and left it remaining in the box. That bit of knife-blade exerted its influence on the compass, and to a degree which deflected the needle from its proper bent, and vitiated it as an index of the ship's direction. That bit of knife-blade wrecked the vessel. So one seemingly small sin, the word or deed of a moment, or one look of lingering evil desire may wreck a soul. Keep thy heart, the divine chart of conscience, with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life.

There is really more danger of wreck from little sins and little neglects than from great ones, and so we add another pertinent sailor story from England. The skipper of a little coasting "tramp," called the Banshee, said to his men one day, as they lay in port: "Mates! we shall have our sailing papers in a few days. Get her ready, and don't save the haporth o'tar. We'll leave Waterford with the ould Banshee's cheeks glowin'." "Aye, aye, sir," answered his sailors, as they put away their pipes and went to work with a will. Each one had his special work to do, one to wash up, another to paint, another to polish, another to caulk the timbers, another to oil the davits from which swung the small boats, carried for escape in case of wreck, or for rescue. Logan, who had this last job to do, found he hadn't oil enough to do it right. He had greased the davits of two boats, and now the life-boat, most important of all, needed oil. But he was lazy, and it would take quite a walk to get a supply of oil, and so he said to himself, "The boat was never taken down since it was hoisted, and there's small chance we'll need it this trip. I'll let it go." Two days out the boat was run down by a liner and almost cut in two. "To the boats" was the swift order. All ran for the life-boat, big enough for all, and best of all. Sailors nearest hauled away in vain, and even when many laid hold it was of no use. The lack of those few drops of oil in the pulleys had left the boat immovable. By the time they gave up and turned to the other boats it was too late, and the ship went down. The liner picked up a few of the crew, but most of them were lost. There had been five precious minutes when they might have all escaped by the life-boat but for Logan's neglect to apply the oil. So many a life has been lost by some failure to do some simple duty at the right time and in the right way.

Gave more heed to the master and owner of the ship (v. 11).—Paul warned the captain and owners of the ship, when it was at Fair Havens, that there was danger ahead, and advised remaining where they were for a while; but, as often in the voyage of life, the preacher's voice was disregarded in favor of the worldly wisdom of others, with disastrous results to the very owners who set aside Paul's advice. Many a man has lost all he had because he disregarded moral considerations in favor of what he thought to be money interests.

When the south wind blew softly (v. 13).—Even when a course of life has been taken in disregard of the advice of good men it often happens that all goes smoothly for a while, but beyond is Euroclydon.

And when neither sun nor stars for many days shone on us (v. 20).—They had no compass then, and so must sail wholly by the sun and stars when out of sight of land, and having been under a beclouded sky for days, driven by fierce winds, they were in peril indeed. But in the voyage of life we need not thus lose our course even for an hour. Christ is our never-clouded sun, the Bible our chart, the Spirit in conscience our compass, and we need never miss our "daily observation." It is of utmost moment that we daily test our course by observation of Christ, comparing our deeds and words and spirit with his.

Sirs, be of good cheer; for I believe God (v. 25).—It is a cheering thing indeed when a ship is in peril to have on board one like Paul, who has the fearlessness of faith. A passenger steamer was starting out to sea in a threatening fog. A trembling youth standing near the funnel said to a sailor, "Shall we have a storm?" The sailor, who was a Christian, replied: "Do not allow yourself to be anxious, since the Lord knows our position, and 'like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.'" Years passed and the sailor had become a captain. At the start of one of his voyages a passenger asked, "Shall we have a good voyage, captain?" "That," replied the captain, "no one can tell but He who holds the waters in the hollow of his hand." "You remind me," said the passenger, "of a Christian sailor who answered me in the same trustful spirit on another voyage years ago when a storm was threatening. I was terrified, but he quoted the assurance, 'like as a father pitieth his children.' I was a Jew, but thinking on his quiet confidence in God as a Father, I became a Christian." "How long ago was that," said the captain. "Seventeen years." "Would you know the sailor if you saw him again?" "I think so." "He stands before you." "Impossible; he was a common sailor, but you are a captain." "A greater change has occurred in you than any change in rank or circumstance, if you, who were a Jew, have become a Christian."

Eagerly Looking Forward to Mont-Lawn's Opening

Joy FOR THE Tenement Waifs

You Can Help One Poor Slum Child to a Holiday

LITTLE APPLICANTS FOR MONT-LAWN

ALREADY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S summer campaign among the children of the tenements has begun. Our Fresh-Air Fund workers, who are now busily engaged making up their lists of edy little waifs in the crowded streets and alleys of e slums, find every year an increased demand for this rm of Christian work among the children of the very oor. To these poor wee creatures, ill-fed, ill-housed and ten ragged, a ten days' sojourn at Mont-Lawn means mething delightful beyond all describing, and the hope such a holiday buoys up the childish spirit for weeks efore the happy day comes around. It is no exaggeration to say that several thousand poor tenement children are at the present moment looking forward with eager hope of being taken up to the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home this summer. Shall they be disappointed?

Up at the Home, at beautiful Mont-Lawn, preparations are being pushed for the reception of the first contingent of our little guests, who will arrive there the last week in June. Dormitories are being made to look, if possible, sweeter and fresher than before; the little chapel is cool and inviting; the lawns and blossoming hedge-rows are greener and lovelier than ever. House-mother Collins and her staff of workers will be in charge as in past years. Soon the woods and valleys around Mont-Lawn will re-echo with the laughter and the merriment of the tenement tots, who think an outing there is the one bright spot in their simple and joyless lives.

We cordially invite all our readers to co-operate with us in making the children's summer at Mont-Lawn this year, the most successful the work has ever known. Just remember, if you will, that the work is designed for those little folks in the big city who, through poverty, misfortune, or other causes, are deprived of a joyous childhood: whose lives are a dull, hard monotone of suffering and privation; who never knew the pleasure of pulling a wild flower, or the free and innocent exhilaration of a romp on the grass or a ramble in the woods, until they went up to Mont-Lawn. You, dear reader, can put a big streak of bright sunshine into such a child's life if you will. How to do it is easily explained: $3 contributed to our Fresh-Air Fund pays for a ten days' outing for a tenement boy or girl, transportation and all other matters included; $6 will send a little brother and sister to keep each other company there for ten days, and $21 will endow a cot—a pretty snow-white cot, enameled and with spotless coverings, in one of the dormitories—for a whole season of ten weeks. While you are thinking of your own summer arrangements with pleasurable anticipation, don't forget the little waifs. Every contribution sent to the CHRISTIAN HERALD will be acknowledged.

Rabid Anti-Semitism

ALL the world has been shocked by the report of the atrocities committed on the Jews of Kisheneff, in Russia, details of which are printed on another page. The cruelties, the savage barbarism, the fiendish malignity exhibited are revolting in the extreme. We shrank at first from believing it possible that such acts could be committed in this century, in any country claiming to be civilized. Unhappily, there is now no room for doubt. The story told by eye-witnesses reads like the report of a brutal orgie in the interior of Africa, or in one of the cannibal islands of the South Seas. It is an appalling revelation not only of the ignorance and depravity of the Russian peasantry, but of the supineness, if nothing worse, of the Russian officials. The mob, exasperated to madness by wicked calumnies, fell upon the Jewish citizens, sparing neither women nor children, old men nor babes, beating, mutilating and killing like savages. Apparently there was little or no attempt on the part of the authorities to check the bloodthirsty mob or to protect the property or lives of the victims. Such negligence must surely arouse the indignation of the Russian Government. For its own sake, for the sake of its character in the civilized world, orders for a stern and swift punishment ought to issue from St. Petersburg.

The exciting cause was the old blood accusation, which has been used by the enemies of the Jews for centuries. The ignorant people, who did not know how often the charge has been made and refuted, were told that the Jews had killed a child, to procure blood for horrible Passover rites. To give this charge plausibility, the body of a murdered girl was conveyed into the Jewish quarter, and was then exhibited to the frenzied mob. The newspapers disgraced themselves by feeding the flame, though their own files must have borne witness to the wicked absurdity of the charge. The Jews were defenseless, and the work of spoliation, outrage and murder went on unchecked. It is a horrible story, an anachronism in this age of enlightenment and tolerance.

It is gratifying to learn that the efforts now being made in this country to send relief to the survivors of the massacre are succeeding. Many of the poor people abandoned all their property and fled for their lives. They need help, and the American Jews are giving liberally for the support of the fugitives. The movement deserves public sympathy, and we are glad to see that it is receiving it from people of all ranks and creeds. Help ought to go in so large a volume, as to be a reproof to the lawless ruffians who committed the outrages, and to the educated officials who were recreant to their duty. They must be more dense than we think them, if they cannot read in the spontaneous gifts to the fund, the opinion of this nation, which they profess to regard as a friend. It should also be a lesson to the Jews themselves, convincing them that Christianity has no sympathy with outrages such as this, but only protest and abhorrence. They have had reason enough in the past to associate the Christian name with persecution and cruelty. In this hour of their sorrow they should have practical proof that for Christ's sake, we mourn with them and sympathize with them in their affliction.

The proprietor of this journal is sure that its readers, whose sympathies are ever with the suffering, will wish to be represented in the fund for the relief of these, God's persecuted people. He has therefore sent his check for one hundred dollars to the committee in charge of the relief measures.

Members One of Another

IT is a well-known fact that on various sea-coasts, the encroachment of the sea upon the land has been prevented by means of plants specially adapted to the purpose. These plants belong mostly to the grass tribe, though sometimes to the higher orders, and all possess the peculiarity of underground creeping stems, which, rooting themselves at frequent intervals and sending up fresh shoots at every joint, all linked together, are enabled to offer an effectual resistance to the storm. The enormous dykes which the people have constructed in Holland to keep out the inundations of the German Ocean, owe their stability to such plants; and it is said that along the low eastern coast of England, where the sea is continually seeking to encroach upon the shore, a large quantity of land has in this way been reclaimed from the waters.

It is the social habits of these seaside plants that gives them their wonderful tenacity of life, and so admirably adapts them for the conditions in which they grow. Each separate plant is weak and fragile; left to itself it would quickly be uprooted and swept away by the fury of the tide. But when linked and interlaced in the closest fashion with the whole mass of similar plant life growing around, it can hold its own against the strongest forces of the ocean.

What we have to do as Christians in this world is like the work of the seaside plants. To prevent the encroachments of error, to beat back the waves of evil, to resist the storms of temptation, to win new additions to the kingdom of righteousness and peace—this is the work given us to do on earth. And we can do this in the high spiritual realm only as the grass by the seaside does its task in the lower realm of physical nature, through the power of association; by realizing the vital bond by which Christians are members one of another—tied together in Christ Jesus, and made, however numerous and widely scattered, one body in the Lord.

Christ, the Preachers' Model

AT a large gathering of Presbyterian ministers in New York City, a few days ago, some excitement was occasioned by one of the members present, who denounced in vigorous terms the modern tendency of preachers to discuss political, social, and economic problems from the pulpit. This reverend critic, no doubt with the best intentions, declared that it was hard nowadays to find a preacher who did not "take his fling" at public questions. He thought the pendulum had swung altogether too far, and the Gospel was neglected just in proportion as the questions of the day were dealt with. There was a time, he reminded his clerical audience, when to drag such topics into their pulpit utterances would have been considered a crime.

For the pastor who transforms his pulpit into a lecture platform, whereon he may expatiate on politics, science, travel, anecdote, or any one of a thousand other themes, and who subordinates or wholly neglects his Gospel commission, we have little sympathy, and no admiration. He probably deserves the severest censure uttered by the critic in question. But if the intention was to make the application so general as to include any considerable proportion of the ministry today, it was both unwise and unjust. No good reason can be adduced to show why the passing incident or the personal experience, as well as the event that stirs a community or agitates a nation, may not be a legitimate and spiritually profitable theme for pulpit treatment, and a valuable adjunct in pressing home a Gospel lesson.

There is an impression abroad that the religion of Christ is an ancient and outworn religion, dealing with the past and with no special application to occurrences in our own time. To show that the Christian religion has a vital relation to everything that is taking place in the world to-day, and that it is as much a religion for the twentieth century as it was for the first, is the duty of the pulpit. If we take the teaching of Jesus Christ, the greatest of all models, we find that passing events were frequently referred to in his utterances. He did not consider it a degradation of his ministry to speak on the social evil as it existed in his day. He dealt sternly with current public evils and vices, the arrogance of rulers, the extortions practiced by those in power, the heartless extravagance of the rich, and the hopeless indigence of the hungry multitudes that were then found in Galilee, just as they are found in Europe and America to-day. The disaster at Siloam afforded Him opportunity for a lesson, as well as the ultra-rigorous Sabbath observance of the Pharisees, the bigotry of the priesthood, the craft and greed of the merchants and shopkeepers, and the cunning of the lawyers. All these and many more topics of the moment, He skilfully employed for a spiritual purpose. He did not disdain events in which the whole Jewish world was intensely interested. A false dignity did not blind the Divine eyes to what was going on around Him. He addressed both the classes and the masses, and his language sometimes roused in them such passions that they sought his life. No incident was too trivial or too startling to be made a vehicle for the Gospel truth He desired to convey to the hearts of his hearers. His message was not centuries old, appealing only to a limited auditory among the erudite, or to the students of the sacred books of the Jewish race; but a message that throbbed and vibrated with the life of the hour and the moment, and which was pertinent to all who heard it.

It is clear, therefore, that the preacher who seizes and adapts to the purposes of his Gospel teaching the events of his own time, has an impregnable vantage ground. He has the greatest of precedents, the grandest of models. But never, in his preaching, should he lose sight of the old Gospel, or of its central fact, as the basis of his discourse. We heartily concur with those who denounce the side-tracking of the old Gospel for the timely topic, or for a mere moral disquisition on social, scientific, or educational matters. We have no patience with those who make the pulpit a political threshing-floor. Such a course is the grossest abuse of the preacher's privileges. It is one, however, into which the true pastor will never fall, consecrated as he is to his spiritual mission and consumed with the desire to win souls. He may make a legitimate use of all themes, and rightly used they will aid rather than impede his work; but he will make them all subsidiary to the great central topic—Jesus Christ and Him crucified, "whom to know is life eternal."

—WHEN the Rev. C. M. Sheldon wrote his well-known book, In His Steps, he touched a tender chord in the hearts of the multitude. In his latest, and as competent critics declare, his greatest work, the first chapters of which will appear exclusively in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on July 1st, the famous Kansas pastor has taken up a new theme, which he handles with great literary skill and strength. Indeed, all the characters in "The Narrow Gate" are strongly drawn, and the action moves along with such rapidity and dramatic force, that the reader is unconsciously carried with the tide, as though he himself were a part of the story. It is a tale which should be read in every home in America.

"THE NARROW GATE,"

The President in the West

WHILE the President has had enthusiastic receptions in many cities during his Western tour, there were scarcely any that he appeared to enjoy more than those at Santa Fe and Albuquerque, N.M. He recalled the fact that more than one-half the members of his regiment of Rough Riders came from New Mexico, and declared that he felt that he was among old friends. The people, on their side, were delighted to have him visit their Territory and spared no pains to do him honor. At Santa Fe a crowd of fully ten thousand persons gathered around the Capitol to hear his address. They are anxious for statehood, and the President encouraged them to hope for it. He told them that the preservation of their forests and the extension of irrigation, would inevitably make New Mexico one of the greatest States of the West. Much depended on the thrift and enterprise of the people, but where those were manifested the Government would surely help.

Another audience of three thousand school children gathered later in the day, to whom the President made one of his happy, characteristic speeches. At Albuquerque there was similar enthusiasm. The streets were gaily decorated, and a stand was erected in front of the chief hotel, from which the President addressed an enormous audience. Here, again, he was reminded in picturesque fashion of the ambition of the people. A group of forty-five pretty little girls, dressed in white, representing the States, were seen in an enclosure, the entrance to which was guarded by a man dressed in the traditional costume of Uncle Sam. One little girl, as bright as any of those within the enclosure, wanted to enter, but Uncle Sam barred the way. The President had no difficulty in understanding the meaning of the tableau, and told the people that, so far as he could see, there seemed nothing the matter with the little girl on the outside. If it rested with the President to admit the Territory to Statehood, there is little doubt that the desire of the citizens would be granted, but the consent of Congress has to be obtained. Happily for all of us, admission into the kingdom of God is not barred by any assembly or church. God himself rules there, and his invitation is extended to all who have his Spirit.

Through him we have access by one spirit to the Father. Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God (Eph. 2: 18, 19).

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ADDRESSING AN AUDIENCE AT ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.

The Russian Horror

Cable dispatches from Southwestern Russia, recently brought news of an anti-Jewish outbreak in that region, so barbarous that it was set down as a wild exaggeration. Unhappily, the later reports, brought by trustworthy eye-witnesses, prove that the facts are worse than originally stated. The scene of the outrages was Kishineff, the chief town of Bessarabia, the Russian province on the borders of Roumania. It has a population of 140,000, about one-third of which is Jewish. It was at the Easter holidays that the outbreak occurred. The Jews had been celebrating the Passover, and the Christians, Easter. Some uneasiness existed, owing to the publication in a local journal of aspersions on the Jews. The old accusation that the Jews used the blood of a child at their rites, was revived, in connection with the discovery in the Jewish section, of the body of a Christian child who had been murdered. The attitude of the lower classes toward the Jews became so menacing, that an appeal was made to the Governor of Bessarabia for protection. He made light, however, of the danger, and refused to take any measures for the preservation of the peace. Early on the morning of Sunday, April 12, the trouble began. Some of the lower classes broke open Jewish stores and came out laden with goods. The police did not interfere, so the mob speedily increased in size and grew bolder. Looting went on all morning. One street was ravaged from end to end. Some Jews who were on the street were savagely seized and beaten. By mid-day robbery became too tame an amusement for the frenzied mobs. The Jews were sought in their houses and were clubbed to death. Such of them as had hidden themselves in the upper rooms were flung from the windows. All day the work of destruction and murder went on. At night there was a lull, but on Monday morning it began again with new intensity. Savage cruelty was the order of the day. Women were subjected to horrible indignities; children were literally torn to pieces: a Jewish carpenter was found and his hands were sawn off with his own saw; even the dead bodies of the murdered Jews were mutilated and portions carried off as souvenirs by the frenzied rioters. Horrors too revolting for description were perpetrated on every street. The hospitals were filled with the wounded and the dying. Aged men, delicate women, young children were among the dead and dying. One man who fled for his life crawled back at night to his house, and found the bodies of his wife and his nine children slaughtered in one room. During all this time no effort was made by the authorities to stem the awful carnage. It was not until a regiment of Cossacks from Odessa was sent into the town that the mobs were dispersed. The condition of the Jewish survivors is most pitiable. Stripped of their property, they have come out of their hiding places without clothes or food. Men, mourning the loss of their wives; mothers, weeping over their slaughtered children; homeless, and penniless, and miserable, their situation is appalling. No race on earth has had to bear such a succession of similar calamities. Not even the spread of civilization seems to bring relief to them. They have, it appears, to suffer in the twentieth century the unreasoning hate and the wicked persecution that their prophets warned them would follow them wherever they might go.

And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: and the life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life (Deut. 28: 65, 66).

Wealthy but in Service

A young lady of Wilkesbarre, Pa., who has been searching for her mother since November last, when she strangely disappeared, has found her acting as a domestic servant for a family at Newark, N. J. The mother, who is a widow, owns real estate and personal property producing a large income. She was living in good style, and had no known reason for hiding herself. Shortly after the death of her husband, last year, her mind is said to have become affected. She left her home without warning. Since her disappearance her daughter has been prosecuting a search for her, and, only by accident, learned recently that a woman answering the description of her mother was employed as a servant by a family in Newark. She found her mother at their house, but at first obtained no recognition from her. The family said that she seemed to have forgotten all about her previous life, and worked faithfully and intelligently at ordinary household duties. The daughter eventually persuaded her mother to return home with her, and hopes that in the familiar scenes her strange hallucination may disappear. Her mind must have been sadly unbalanced, otherwise she would not have left her comfortable home and given up her freedom to take service with strangers. There are, however, many who are apparently sane, who are acting with almost as little sense in serving Satan, when they might enjoy the privileges of the children of God.

The God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not (II Cor. 4: 4).

An Heiress From an Almshouse

A romantic history, heretofore unsuspected, was disclosed in a suit tried in a Brooklyn, N. Y., law court last week. It was a test case, the issue of which was to decide the ownership of a large estate. The claimant is one of two sisters who were supposed to be the daughters of a wealthy citizen. He was away from the city for some years during the war. When he returned he brought with him two little girls, whom he treated as his daughters, called them by his name and educated. One of them died, but the other grew up and was married. She inherited the estate of her supposed father. Recently, the sale of a part of the estate involved a search of the title. As there was some doubt about it, the test suit was brought. It was then revealed that the two children had been taken from an almshouse in Massachusetts, and that nothing was known as to their parentage. There was, however, no doubt as to the legality of the adoption, and therefore the title was duly confirmed by the court. To the claimant who knew the truth, the decision must have been a relief from anxiety. Happily no such anxieties need disturb those who have been adopted into the family of God. Their inheritance is assured to them.

Ye have received the spirit of adoption . . . and if children then heirs: heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8: 15-17).

ONE DAY IN MARYLAND

A Memorial Day Story

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

TEN thousand men in faded army blue were encamped near Annapolis, in the last year of the Civil War. The atmosphere around them was full of unrest; the tense anticipation of an impending crisis. They were eating their hearts out in the ennui of idleness, when any day the nation's destiny might hang on the turn of a battle, and they were seasoned soldiers. To the general uneasiness, the men from counties nearby added a peculiar and tormenting homesickness. Every State in the Union was represented in the fragmentary companies of paroled prisoners awaiting exchange, but a man from Iowa could be more philosophical in foregoing a reluctantly granted furlough, than a fellow from Princess Anne or Prince George, who was, so to speak, in his own bailiwick. The latter had hunted over every field, and fished in every brook in the State. Furthermore, his home people were in the unpopular minority, in a region where opinion in a turbulent period was sharply divided, and, being so near, he longed to see for himself how they had fared in his absence. There was no little jeering at the governmental red tape. It was trying to be tied with a string, unable to lift hand or foot when so much was happening at the front.

Tom MacGregor was a private in a Maryland regiment. He had spent ten drearily dragging months in Libby, and had been three weeks in camp; three weary weeks, with his home embowered among peach orchards, not ten miles away. He could shut his eyes, and see the long, low, rambling house, white to the eaves; the lean-to, where old Aunt Phyllis pottered and grumbled over her cookery; the porch with the splint-bottomed chairs, and his wife's chamber, with the billowy feather bed, at the right of the broad passage: you went up to that bed by steps. There was a little white crib in the corner, and a table between the windows, where candles stood, and Molly kept her prayer-book and his picture. Tom was a big fellow, six-feet-two in his stockings; broad-shouldered, blue-eyed.

Two years and more had elapsed since he had enlisted, leaving a young wife and a month-old baby in the care of Aunt Phyllis, at the farm.

An older man in the tent was puffing away at a short clay pipe, and poring over a novel, as Tom, one morning, read his letter from Molly. Molly's letter was his daily bread of comfort, but to-day he read it with a groan that was melancholy personified.

"What's up, Tom?" his friend asked, after a glance at the haggard wretchedness of MacGregor's face.

"Molly's ill; the boy, too. She's afraid he's going to die."

"Oh, maybe not," said the father of seven, cheerfully, with an effort at consolation. "Kids frighten the life out of you, especially when there's only one. They can get into awfully close quarters with death, and then cheat him. Benny may be chipper enough by now. Brace up, old man."

"The trouble is, I've forgotten how to do it," said Tom desperately. "I want to go home."

"So do I; but I can wait."

"Well, I can't. I've simply got to see Molly and the baby. There's more in it, Ed, than her being down with the chills, and the boy having croup; lots more. That measly, low-down cur of a Dick Elmore is about again with his crowd, and Molly's almost out of her mind. And here am I, helpless! 'Tisn't as if I were a hundred miles away, either. It's not to be borne. Flesh and blood can't stand it."

"Dick Elmore back!" cried Ed. Mallory, knocking the ashes out of his pipe and sitting up. He had been lounging a bit over his book.

"I thought Dick and his crew were off to the war safe enough."

"They have been; but they are mustered out, and they've been loitering around the old place lately. Ed, you remember that Dick courted Molly Russell when I did. He swore that she was his sweetheart first, and vowed he'd be even with me for getting ahead of him. Now's his chance. He may burn the house down over her head. She may be homeless this minute."

"Come, Tom, be reasonable. Dick is low-down as you say, but not so low-down. The country-side would be too hot for him if he did a thing like that. I know the breed, but seriously, I don't think even Dick would attack a defenceless woman. Pull yourself together, man. Walk boldly up to headquarters; tell the colonel about it, and get a leave."

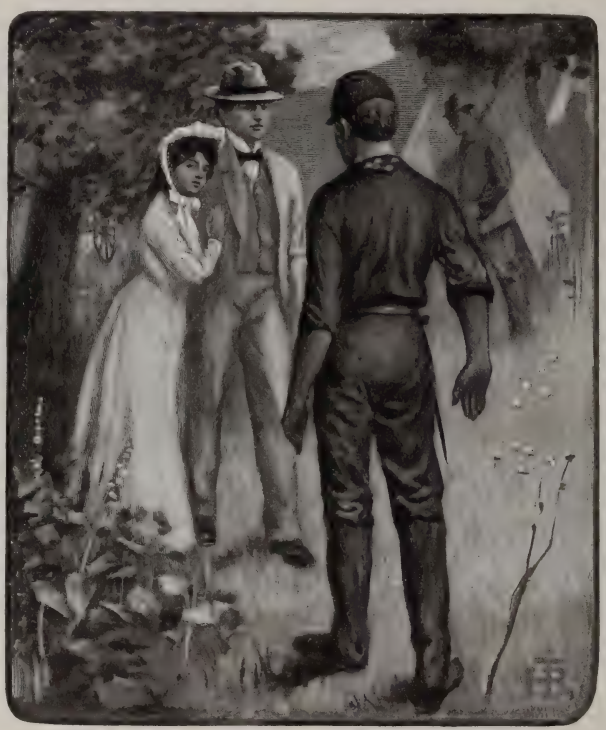
"No use, Ed."

"I'd like to know why it's no use."

"Colonel's kind enough, but he's under orders. He can't grant any more furloughs at present, things being as they are. Tell you what, Ed, I'm in a hole, for sure. If I can't get out I'll go mad. Think of it, Molly needs me, and I can't do a thing but write. What's writing worth? Poor little Molly needs me!"

Ed Mallory smoked in silence. At home, he and Tom were neighbors. He had seen pretty Molly Russell grow up from a light-hearted child into a beautiful girl who was the toast of the county. She had queened it imperiously the year she left school, and it was hers to take her pick of the men with whom she danced, and rode, and flirted, as elusive as a will o' the wisp. There had been a neck-to-neck race for her favor between Tom MacGregor and Dick Elmore, and Tom had come off victor. Ed had a passing memory of Dick Elmore glooming in the church aisle, and bringing black looks to the wedding supper; but for that matter, the young men for miles around felt like wearing crape on their sleeves when Molly Russell married. Presently, Ed looked up to see Tom glowering from the edge of his cot, blackness on his brow, his lips compressed.

"Dick Elmore's an ornery cuss, for a fact," meditated Ed. Mallory. He mentally looked back at that rose-crowned wedding day, and then thought how a year afterward the war-cloud had burst and swept their county clear of all the able-bodied men. Nobody left in it but the women and children, the very old men or the very young, or the hopelessly infirm. Union or Confederate, the fighting contingent had found its place in the ranks.



"SLOWLY, STEP BY STEP, CAME TOM MACGREGOR AND MOLLY"

Till Tom had spoken, Ed had completely forgotten that Dick Elmore came of a family noted for vindictiveness, with traditions of the vendetta. Its history was bad all through. The Elmores stopped at nothing when they were at feud, yet, to Ed's calm common sense, it seemed impossible that anybody, even an Elmore, should be forever implacable because a girl had discarded one man and chosen another. Surely, Molly had been well within her rights.

"Why not go home, old man? Cut and run for it." Ed bent forward, speaking low. Tent walls are thin.

Tom drew a long breath. "I might."

"Not that I think Dick's going to be up to any foolishness. It's you I'm studying over. You could take French leave easy enough, dead easy. It's been done in this camp, and not found out. You would not have to stay away long. I'd account for you somehow. And, Tom, if you go, try to see Sally and my folks at home. Take my love to them."

A mist came over Ed's honest eyes. As he brushed it away with his rough brown hand, he started to his feet, and Tom did the same. Both were Marylanders, and instinctively gallant in the presence of a woman. The wife of the commandant was standing in the low doorway of the tent. She parted its flaps, and came composedly in.

Tall, fair, with coppery hair massed in a great knot low in her neck, dressed in white linen, with a big shade hat, and a green parasol, this girl-wife of the old colonel looked like the spirit of the Spring. To the war-worn veterans, and the men in hospital, tossing on the hard cots, she was as the spirit of home itself. She went her rounds daily as the doctors did, a ministering angel everywhere. But at this instant she was an unwelcome apparition in Tom MacGregor's tent.

"You shouldn't speak so loud, you two," she said. "Somebody else might hear you. No, don't worry, boys, nobody did hear you, as it happened, except me, and I won't tell." She stepped to the tent door and looked out. The camp was asleep in the white glare of the morning sun. In a field some distance off men were playing baseball. The street was very still.

"This is, just now, a deserted village. Why don't you go home, Tom MacGregor?" said the colonel's wife, softly. She looked him straight in the eyes, and spoke persuasively.

"Slip away between two days, and come back the same way. Go and see Molly. I'll keep your secret. You can evade the guards somehow." . . .

Whence came her knowledge? Was she a temptress or a man's best friend? The two soldiers gazed at her in bewilderment. There was novelty in the situation and a little perplexity. But they believed in a good woman's wisdom. Nevertheless, Ed hedged.

"Things are better fair and open," he said.

He was regretting his counsel of a moment ago. Tom was reading his letter again. He handed it silently to the lady.

"Oh," she gasped, as her eyes fell on Molly's blotted, hurried scrawl. "You must see your child; Jack must let you go, right away. I'll speak for you." Then she recalled herself, "but he's not here; he's been ordered to Washington, and he went on the last train. He may not be back for some days. And Major Sutphen has no heart; nothing but a stone under his uniform. He wouldn't care."

The men nodded. The little woman voiced their own sentiments. So they "sized up" the major. All three knew Major Sutphen as a bluff, rigid, perfect martinet. The colonel's wife had frequent quarrels with him, and he regarded her as an upsetter of discipline, and a sort of spoiled child, though he shared with everyone else a real liking for her sweet and fearless ways. The colonel's wife knew that she was about to do something indefensible; but the woman's heart was stronger than her mind, and she did not hesitate.

"Mr. MacGregor," she said, "I'll contrive somehow to get a bundle to you in a half hour. There will be a note inside with money. Go somewhere beyond camp limits, and put on my brother Alec's suit. It will fit you. Mr. Mallory here must look out for your uniform, and bring it back. I'll furnish the civilian's disguise, and your own wits must do the rest. Go oldly home by train. Why, you may eat upper to-night with Molly."

Her cheeks burned as she turned to leave; ut it was with excitement only. She had ever shrunk from the initiative in her life.

"God bless you forever and forever, mad. m," said Tom MacGregor, reverently.

"My soul!" exclaimed Ed. "If that woman n't a trump! A regular brick, and no mis. ake."

The colonel's wife strolled back to the lit. e house on the edge of the camp, where she ad three little rooms of her own, in which to ake a home, and brighten life for her hus. and and the staff. She passed the orderly t her door with a pleasant word, and went to er own room, where she made up the pack. ge of which she had spoken. Presently she dled forth again, taking Laddie, her big col. e, as her companion. So many times a day e went out on one or another errand of ercy, that her goings were unremarked by fficers or men, only the stiff old major, meet. g her with a courtly bow, asked, "Whither way," and if he might not carry her bundle?

"Thanks, major," she said. "I won't bother ou. It isn't heavy."

When she was near Tom's tent, she glanced refully around to be sure she was unob. erved, then sent Laddie forward with a ound, and the dog dropped his burden at om MacGregor's feet.

That night the soldier ate corn pone that unt Phyllis baked, and drank hot coffee that olly poured for him, and held his little ild in his arms at home. There had been trouble. On the train he had awakened suspicion, and as he left it in the gloaming met nobody at the station. He had not ept the high road. It was quicker to go ross the pasture and meadow land, ford the tle brawling brook, foaming over the step. g stones, and dash down the lane to the rmhouse door. To lift the latch; to steal in Molly, and surprise her, had been his first tention, but he thought better of it, and ve his old knock and his old whistle, and od, hat in hand, till she herself, with a cry delight, came and drew him over the thresh. d. She could not speak for joy. Pale, thin, a worn cotton gown, with big brown eyes at had haunting shadows beneath them, she s not much like the radiant girl he had arried; but she was Molly, and he had his ms about her and kissed her as if he could ver let her go. Then old Aunt Phyllis gged and cried over her boy, whom she had rsed as she now nursed his son, and both men, the black as well as the white, hovered er him with a joy too deep for words. The ld was better, thank God. "Real peart," d Aunt Phyllis, "and Miss Molly would on be well now that Mars Tom had come me."

The house stood far back from the turn. e, sheltered behind great oaks; no one ssed it after dark, yet Tom was a little un. y until it was barred and bolted for the ght.

"You are home for good, my darling?" said olly wonderingly, touching the gray sleeve Alec Moffatt's business suit.

The question embarrassed him, and a dull ck color slowly crept from chin to forehead. "No, I'm not home for good," he said slow. "I really have no right to be here, Molly. stole away with a friend's help—sneaked ay, to tell the truth. And I'm going back camp as soon as I've seen you and my boy daylight. Ed Mallory's looking out for at that end."

He hated telling Molly how he had left his form under a scrub oak, and changed his thing like a thief, skulking behind bushes, afraid of rabbits when they scurried out the copse. Tom MacGregor had never be. had anything to hide. But Molly con. d him, not with mere words; with tender ks and wifely caresses. She rejoiced in his ck, and scoffed at the idea of anything ng in the matter.

"Had she no claim? Was the country to everything?" she urged. She agreed with colonel's wife that Tom had had no choice. "Suppose Benny had died?" she asked, as still looked unconvinced. "Could I have ied him alone?"

"Anyway," the big fellow shook himself a dog reaching dry land after a plunge in river, "here, I am now, dear, and I did ith my eyes open, and for the best. Let's e one happy day."

hey did. The next day was retained in lly's memory forever as the red-letter day er life—a day perfect, unmarred, blissful, n joy rose to its highest tidal wave.

ight came to even such a day, and black llis again went about securing doors and dows. The front door was fastened by a wooden bar that rested on iron staples. st of the windows had thick wooden shut. , but the porch windows were shielded by blinds. Phyllis put the candles out. pine knots on the hearth made a ruddy e. "Light enough to court by, honey," she to her Miss Molly. At last she creaked ily upstairs to the loft where she slept; Tom, by the hearth, gathered his wife in arms, and sat there talking, with her head his breast. Dick Elmore had not been tioned, but now Tom asked casually if ly thought him still in the county.

Oh, he's gone, Tom dear. Aunt Phyllis hears everything," she says he's gone away West. I was a baby to write to you; but I'm afraid of my life of that man."

"Molly, that's what compelled me to come home. Not your fear, but mine. I had a vision; of course it was absurd, but it rose before me of Dick's coming here in the night and frightening you. It's dreadful, your being here alone with nobody but Aunt Phyllis. The thought has made me a deserter for two days. But I'll be off at daybreak with a light heart, for you see, dearest, we may be exchanged any hour now, and it's dangerous to be absent without leave. The thing rather breaks me up. I've had a clean record thus far. Another year will see the war finished, I hope, and then I'll be at home with you forever."

Another year! Molly sighed. It looked endless before her. She leaned closer in her husband's arms. There, tired out, she fell asleep. He would not move lest he should disturb her. Across the hall Molly's chamber stood invitingly open. The bed was whitely spread, and the covers turned down. Tom thought of carrying her over and laying her on her bed, but it was so dear to hold her as he did. He passed his fingers gently over her hair. His eyes lingered on her little ear, like a pink shell, on her cheek that had lost so much roundness, on the delicate mouth, and the long, curling eyelashes. His Molly! His precious wife! He had been a prisoner in Libby, and now he was at home; a sojourner in hell. This was heaven.

Thus encircled by his arms, Molly slept awhile, and Tom drowsed and dreamed. Suddenly he was startled. Something was astir outside. The old dog growled in his kennel. Surely there were hoof-beats and smothered voices. Tom's senses were alert, and he was at once wide awake. What was that at the porch window—there one second, gone the next? What but a face, so sinister, so cruel, so menacing, it set all his blood fiercely pumping like fever in his veins. But he controlled himself, and was cool and steady as he laid Molly gently down on the worn old sofa, deliberately bent and kissed her, and reached automatically for his rifle. Alas! it was in camp.

A tap at the door.

"Open to friends," said a voice he remembered. For an instant he was minded not to, and Aunt Phyllis, lumbering heavily from the loft, called to him in agonized accents to stay inside.

"Don't unbar de do', for de Lord's sake, Mars Tom," she begged.

But the voice he knew taunted him mockingly from outside.

"'Fraid are you? Who'd counted on that? 'Fraid of an old chum at that! Well, I'll be off. A MacGregor afraid of an Elmore! Bein' in prison so long has done that, I suppose."

Tom dropped the wooden bar, and opening the door, stepped to the porch.

"Hello, old man!" Dick Elmore's daredevil laugh challenged him. "Met in good time, as I've always intended. Say your last prayer, Tom MacGregor, your time has come!"

In the yard back of Dick were a half dozen men on horseback. They were huddled together in the shadows, but as their leader spoke, they closed about the house and covered Tom with their revolvers. Dick held his own six-shooter, taking deadly aim at Tom.

"Out of the way, Aunty," he called to Phyllis, who in the entry was wringing her hands and imploring. "No use in killing you too; you'll have your work looking out for Tom's widow. Say your prayers, Tom, I tell you. It's your last hour on earth. Your time has come."

In that supreme moment the nerve of the MacGregors stood Tom in good stead. He did not blanch. An old schoolmate, holding Dick Elmore's horse by the bridle, turned away in momentary shame.

"You miserable coward and bully," came Tom's voice, cold as steel, "would you murder an unarmed man? Will you not give me one chance for my life?"

"I have meant to kill you sooner or later, Tom, ever since you stole the girl I wanted to marry. So, good-bye."

As he fired his own hand was struck, and the ball was deflected from its course. It did not reach Tom's heart. A pistol shot from indoors crossed it, and the assassin rode off wounded. Molly MacGregor had awakened. She was on her feet in an instant, and the loaded pistol, without which no woman on the border felt safe in those troublous times, was snatched from her mantel. Oh, that Tom had thought of it before he opened the door! She fired, quick as thought, not knowing nor caring whether she had hit anyone or not, for as Dick jumped on his horse and galloped away, Tom fell across the threshold in a swoon.

"Hush, honey! hush!" Aunt Phyllis was trying to find where her master had been struck. It was somewhere below the heart. She slipped her black arm under his head and moistened his lips.

"Hush, honey," she repeated to Molly, who moaned and wailed. "Mars Tom's not hurt that bad. Mars Dick didn't now 'nuff to shoot straight, Miss Molly! Reckon you hit him shore!"

If jewelry or anything of delicacy and value is to be cleaned, and you do not know how to do it, just ask one question: will water injure it? If not, you can wash it in Ivory Soap suds. Pure soap and water will make all sorts of dainty things as clean as when new, but be sure that the soap is pure, for uncombined alkali, grease, rosin and the other ingredients of ordinary soaps may do damage.

FLOWERS

MANY flowers are beautiful,
And some I call by name,
And others for their fragrance
My eager fancy claim.

But what of those I do not love,
On which bestow no care?
'Tis only my short-sightedness—
Some beauty must be there.

So 'tis with God's own chosen,
Lord, clear my vision make,
To see them in their beauty—
And love them for Christ's sake.

PAUL IN A STORM

The Apostle's Tranquillity in Danger

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE thought of visiting Rome, the then centre of the world's power and civilization, had been in Paul's mind a long time. He writes to the Romans from Corinth, after having left Ephesus (Acts 20 : 1, 2): "I have been much hindered from coming to you" (Rom. 15 : 22). Thus, there must have been a thought, perhaps a plan, to visit Rome; but "I must see Rome" shows that it had become a steady purpose. How little he knew that he would enter Rome as a prisoner!

Paul had appealed unto Cæsar, Festus was bound by the law of Rome to send him to be tried before the Emperor of Rome. He was sent as one among other prisoners under the care of a centurion named Julius. A voluntary passenger or fellow-prisoner by the same ship was Aristarchius, of whom we read (Acts 19 : 29; 20 : 4) as being one of Paul's "companions in travel." Thus the Lord let him have some companionship. Not only so, but Julius, at the first port, Sidon, "courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself." There must have been something in the presence of Paul which had power over unprejudiced minds. We know what it was. Another presence than his own was manifest in him. "Not I, but Christ who dwelleth in me" (Gal. 2 : 20), was the power and the Presence which commanded respect.

The vessel from the first had a stormy passage. We read (Acts 27 : 4), "The winds were contrary;" "the wind not suffering us," and the latter expression refers to the vessel into which they transhipped to Myra, a city of Lycia. Their course, after loosing from the coast of Asia Minor, was southwest till they moored on the southeast of the island of Crete. There they stayed some time, probably on account of the bad weather. Sailing was now dangerous, and there were no steamboats in those days. What should they now do?

A man in communion with God cannot see others in trouble or perplexity and say in his heart, "Well, I can't help it; it is no business of mine." A Christian can always help—by prayer. "But those who are around us," some will say, "do not believe in God's answer to prayer." That is all the more reason that they should have proof positive that he does answer prayer; and that, wherever true Christians are to be found, there help in trouble is to be found. Paul prayed, and God heard him and showed him what was going to happen. "Sirs," he said, "I perceive that this voyage will be with injury, and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives." This was light upon the position: God-given light from above. But the centurion, not knowing God, and going upon natural lines, "believed the master and the owner of the ship more than those things which were spoken by Paul." The natural man trusts experience and training more than God.

The centurion judged that the owner of the vessel would not risk his own property unless he believed that the ship would weather any storm they might meet with. But God had shown Paul from above what was going to happen. The haven was not commodious to winter in, so they set sail for Phœnice, another haven of Crete, more to the west, hugging the shore as they went with a soft wind. But not long after "arose a tempestuous wind called Euroclydon" and the ship became unmanageable; all sail had to be taken in: they could do nothing but let her drive. Then things grew worse; the storm increased: they had much difficulty to lower the boat so as to undergird the ship, to prevent her falling to pieces. The valuable cargo had to go, that the ship might be lightened; then the tackling of the ship—anything which would lighten the weight. Day after day passed, and the same heavy sky, the same rough, merciless wind, the same ceaseless rocking of the ship: and it was clear to all that there was little hope for their lives. "All hope that we should be saved was then taken away."

But there was one man to whom God had said, "Thou must bear witness of me in Rome." Paul knew that he should escape, and his prayer went up to God for his fellow-passengers: and God heard him, so that he was able to encourage them.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXXIX
Thorn and Thistle Psalm

5. Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion.

6. Let them be as the grass upon the house tops, which withereth afore it groweth up:

7. Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom.

"THE MOWER"

Strange Psalm is the 129th. It takes one to the farm and field. We get plowing, mowing and reaping with thoughts of harvest; but the thorn and thistle are suggested by the wicked. The parable of the sower must be read with it. Dead grass is not gathered, nor withered Christians either. Chaff and wheat in the end do not go together.

PSALM CXXX
Penitential Psalm

1. Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord.
2. Lord, hear my voice: let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.

"I CRIED UNTO THEE"

3. If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?

4. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

How good of God to make repentance possible. What doom would be ours if iniquity had no remedy, if the works of sin could never be erased. Sin sinks folk very deep, but salvation lifts them very high. With God in Christ there is not only redemption, but plenteous redemption. Not a few sins forgiven, but all iniquity purged.

PSALM CXXXI
Psalm for the Humble

1. Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me.

2. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother.

"AS A CHILD"

Psalm CXXXI is a true picture of the humble man or woman. It is like soft music, or a calm sea, or a quiet soul before God. Some Psalms make you quake and tremble; this one is like the visit of an angel—like an hour of refreshing talk with a great, good saint. Many arrogant scholars, full of conceit and supposed knowledge, should read this and profit.

PSALM CXXXII
Church Builder's Psalm

1. Lord, remember David, and all his afflictions.
2. How he sware unto the Lord, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob.

"A PLACE FOR THE LORD"

3. Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed.

4. I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids.

5. Until I find out a place for the Lord, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob.

He who builds a house of prayer glorifies God. An earthly Zion is to pilgrims both rest and refreshment. They who build will be blessed, and their children. A good church, in any community, is like the Ark of the Covenant—blessings rest where it abides. Living temples is where the highest loves to dwell. The lowly and contrite have but to lift the doors of their heart, and the King of Glory will come in.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. McL., Port Elgin, Ont. Are we doing right to have so many churches in which practically the same Gospel is being preached, when there are so many heathen who have never heard the Gospel? Could not men and money be used more effectively for the advance of Christ's kingdom than they now are?

The belief that our methods might be improved in this matter is becoming increasingly prevalent. An initiatory step toward reform is being made in the Federation of Churches. If the churches of kindred denominations can be induced to co-operate in Christian work, there is ground to hope that they may eventually feel so much brotherliness that they will cease to compete with one another, and that there may be more union churches, supported by men who are united in essential things and charitable and tolerant as to minor differences.

Reader, Topeka, Kan. Has any modern nation or creed a parallel to the Jewish scapegoat?

Yes; the Biajus or aborigines of Borneo have such a custom, but the object employed is not a goat but a boat. They load it, by a priestly ceremonial, with the bad luck and misfortunes of the nation and set it adrift without a crew. Anyone who picks it up is believed to encounter misfortune.

Ellen D. M., Rahway, N. J. What is the origin of "Punch and Judy"?

The little play, which is familiar in various forms in almost every country in Europe, is supposed to have originally been an ancient Roman buffo-play, or folk-comedy. Maccus, a mimic or buffoon, was the prototype of the modern Punch. After the dawn of the Christian era, Maccus was utilized as Punch (Pontius Pilate), and Judy (Judas Iscariot) was added. It then became a "Mystery play" and diminutive figures were used. The little drama, as it is now known, is said to have been written by Silvio Florillo, an Italian comedian of the seventeenth century.

Reader, Summit, Miss. 1. Should a Christian wife insist upon reading aloud her Bible lesson at night, when her husband has asked her not to; as he didn't care to hear it? 2. To what extent will Christian parents be held responsible for the moral training of their children? What is to be thought of a mother who allows her young boys to read the lives of the notorious robbers, "Copeland Brothers," and such literature?

1. If reading it aloud in his presence is a cause of friction, she should read it in the privacy of her room. 2. To the fullest extent. "As the twig is bent, the tree's inclined." If she permits the children to read vicious and sensational books, she must expect to find that they will exert an evil influence upon the minds of the children and may possibly ruin their lives.

Subscriber, Brooklyn, N. Y. In speaking with a friend lately, he remarked that So-and-So "had very ambitious proclivities." Was he strictly correct?

No. The word can only be applied properly to downward or degrading tendencies. It is from the Latin procivis, meaning a downward slope or impulse.

Anxious, Sterling, Colo. 1. Would it be wrong or illegal for me to set to music the poem of another and have it published? The poem is not copyrighted. 2. I wear an article of clothing which is patented and I think I could improve on it to good deal. I have not the money to spend having it patented. Do you suppose I could get anything for my ideas from the company holding the first patent?

1. Yes, morally, if not legally wrong. Write to the author and ask permission. 2. If you communicated with the original patentee, you would quickly learn whether your improvement had any value.

L. M. Ogden, Utah. What is meant by the legend or fable of the "Ordeal Bridge"?

It is a parable in the Koran, which tells of Al Serat, the bridge over which all have to pass at the resurrection. It is as narrow as the keen edge of a scimitar, and it spans the gulf of hell. The faithful pass over in safety, but the wicked fall headlong into the abyss.

Disputant, Albany, N.Y. Kindly give your judgment on the following: A non-literary person engages an author to write a book of fiction, giving him the outline of a plot which he wishes elaborated. In the process of composition, a purely minor character, striking the author's fancy, develops into an important character, indeed, the principal one in the story, which is pronounced excellent. But the person who suggested the book rejects the author's work, on the ground that it is not what he wished and therefore should not be published. Which has the right of way, author or suggester?

It depends altogether on the original agreement. If the writer undertook merely to clothe the other's ideas in literary form, he has exceeded the agreement in giving undue prominence to a subordinate character. If, on the other hand, there was no specific contract, but he was to be left free to develop the story according to his own literary tastes, he had a right to avail himself of his full privileges. In the absence of a specific contract, it would probably be held that the author had the right to do what he did. There is no proprietary right in ideas, but on the setting or form in which the ideas are presented. The case is a delicate one, and would probably puzzle a jury to decide.

Rev. G. S. Pollock, Renfrew, Pa. Where can the following lines be found: Wherein the earliest
He giveth gladness and peace service
Here and Hereafter, unto Him Who first
Sent, ordered on his each glorious errand,
Who gird assistance, ordering peace, blessed,
Leads on to the triumph of the dead,
The white robe and the palm.

Perhaps some of our readers can send the information desired.

Edith, C. B., Watkins, N. Y. Will you please tell me which are considered the most famous hymns, the names of the writers, and where I can find a little sketch of their lives.

There are so many famous hymns, that to publish their history even briefly, would require more space than we can give. Write to Advance Publishing Company, 215 Madison Street, Chicago, for the book Hymns Historically Famous, price $1.25.

This letter comes from Rev. James Greer Woods, of San German, Puerto Rico:

Dear Editor—I have intended to write and thank you for your gift of Gospels. Of course, I could have said "Thank you," and so got the matter off my hands; but I desired to tell you how much of a help those Gospels are. They are a great help and attraction in present work they are excellent. They not only carry the Gospel—the Story of Jesus—but also contain very choice hymns. They interest some because of the English, another because of the hymns, and a third because of the Gospel itself. I am preaching in four different towns. You sent me 150 Gospels. They are so few for my field and I do need more, could use them wisely. Could you not make me a grant of another 150? I hope to send you a photograph of a group of children who had been singing from the little book. If you can send me these books, please send them to the American Tract Society, 150 Nassau street, with a note that they are to be packed with my shipment.

If any of our readers wish to have a share in this Gospelization of Puerto Rico, they can do so by sending us twenty-five cents, in return for which five leatherette-bound copies of the Gospel of St. John in English and Spanish (with Moody and Sankey hymns attached), will be sent to the Rev. Mr. Woods, and one copy to the person sending us the money.

Robert J., Rome, Ga. According to the records, those we published were the names of all who came over in the Mayflower, excepting the servants, of course.

Mrs. Ida W. De Bord, of Sharpsdale, Huerfano Co., Colorada, writes us that the homesteaders in that section are in great need, on account of the failure of the last crop. They have passed through a severe winter ordeal. Now they need money to buy seed for sowing. Any reader wishing to communicate, will be promptly answered by Mrs. De Bord, who is secretary of the Local Committee.

This from Mrs. W. E. W., of Bluefield, W. Va., is a very interesting item of news to Sunday School workers:

At Narrows, Va., a small town where we held a Sunday School Institute, I was received into the home of Mr. and Mrs. I. R. Johnstone. Mr. Johnstone has taught the primary class of girls at the M. E. Church for twenty-two years, and in his class at this time he has the daughters of some of his first scholars. His soul is bound up in his work, and he affirms that he does not want to be advanced to larger scholars, but feels called to teach these little ones. I met some of the present class, and also some of those who have been advanced to intermediate classes, and a better instructed lot of Bible students I never saw anywhere.

Miss S. A. F., Farmingdale, Ill. 1. Yes, according to the traditional dimensions, it was larger than the ark. 2. We never heard such a statement. The ancient Egyptians probably sowed rice in the Nile when the waters were low and the river shallow.

This lady's family (Mrs. Edna C., of Manhattan, Kans.) has acquired quite a little library of CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums. She writes:

We wish to thank you for The Hall of Fame and Speaking Oak. We have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for nearly eighteen years and have forty books, besides Art Portfolio, Art Gallery, two Bibles, and Red-Letter Testament, and we prize them all very highly.

Forty volumes! We wonder whether any other reader can eclipse this record.

Miscellaneous Questions

A. C. W., Hayesville, O. We never heard of the poem mentioned.

A. R., Pueblo, Colo. Consult a physician, and then ask the Lord to bless the means employed to effect a cure.

Reader, Minneapolis, Minn. You should at once inform the proper authorities, in order that the offence may be stopped and the criminals properly punished. There is no middle course in such a case.

Mary, A. C. N., Meadowbank, Pa. We have never heard that the Covenanters wore a distinctive button or badge. It was the custom, in those days, to wear a "cockade" or rosette or knot of ribbon. Send a description of the button to Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D. C.

E. P. W., Lima, N. Y. It is a common custom, and has been so from early Christian times, to bury the dead with head toward the west, although it may not be done in individual cases. Some Oriental races, we believe, follow this plan of burial. It is supposed to have had its origin in the thought that at the resurrection the dead would rise facing the east. Mohammedans are buried with their faces turned toward Mecca.

ESKAY'S FOOD

THESE fine twins are the children of A. J. Cline, 1805 Melrose St., Chicago, who writes: "They weighed 6½ and 7½ lbs. at birth. They had weak digestive organs and for the first three months we tried about everything the Doctor recommended. We thought one could not live, until we tried ESKAY'S FOOD, and it agreed with both of them at once. They weighed at 10 months 28 and 30 lbs. respectively. They are now 14 months old, and we are feeding them all kinds of solid food, as their stomachs never give any trouble. They were fed on ESKAY'S FOOD until they were a year old, and are as well developed in strength and intelligence as children two years of age. Each has 14 teeth, which came without the least fretting."

A well-known specialist in infants' troubles writes: "It is pre-eminently the substitute for mother's milk. I prescribe it constantly."

ANCIENT ABSTAINERS*

Lessons From the Example of the Rechabites

MANY members of the young people's societies will, doubtless, wonder that their religious studies should be broken by the subject of temperance being injected into the list of Topics. It seems like a jarring note in the harmony, a useless reiteration of a threadbare theme. But, unhappily, experience shows that even in a Christian society, there is need for reminding people of this duty. The very fact of living on a higher plane, of having the affections set on higher things, may make total abstinence appear unnecessary. The soul that is in close contact with Christ, is in no danger of falling into the gross sin of drunkenness, so that the barrier of total abstinence is not needed. But it is just there that the principles of Christianity imperatively inculcate the duty. No man liveth to himself; no man has the right to utter Cain's selfish query, "Am I my brother's keeper?" There is so much misery in the world directly traceable to intoxicants that we owe it to Christ and to our fellow-man to set the example of leaving them severely alone. If every Christian would take that stand a great step would be taken toward making this a sober world. The better the man who indulges in the drinking habit, the more harm his example is liable to do. It is not the drunkard staggering in his walk and silly in his talk that the young man sets out to copy. He never expects to sink to that level. He intends to be a moderate drinker, and only when the insidious habit has him in its clutch, does he realize the mistake he has made. One of our philosophers has said very wisely, "If it is a small sacrifice to discontinue the use of intoxicants, do it for the sake of others; if it is a great sacrifice, do it for your own."

THE VISION OF CHRIST†

A Source of Strength and Fortitude in Hours of Trial and Weariness

ONE of the most impressive biographical notes in the Bible, is the explanation given by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews of the fortitude of Moses. He says that Moses was sustained, was enabled to endure, through "seeing Him who is invisible." Of how many men might the same explanation be given! These visions of the invisible, have strengthened and stimulated and inspired men in many an heroic life. A man is plodding along in a business office doing nard and sometimes uncongenial work. He becomes weary, and if he followed his inclination he would leave it all; but there crosses his mind the vision of his children and their mother depending on his exertions, and he settles down again to his labor. Or it may be he has a vision of something that does not exist—only something hoped for. It is a vision of a house and garden in some country place far away from the noise and dirt and din of the city. He is toiling and saving that he may have such a home in which to spend the evening of life. The patriot, the soldier, the sailor, the statesman have their visions in which they see their country growing in influence and power. The philanthropist, struggling to raise his poorer brethren to a higher plane, is cheered by the ideal in his own mind. Or the vision may be of something past. A man in doubt or in temptation looks back, and the spectacle of an aged Christian father or mother long ago laid to rest in the grave rises before his mind's eye, and he puts the evil away from him, as a stain on their memory. Now such a power the vision of Christ may be in our lives. All that he was in this world, all that he bore and suffered for us, and all that he is now in his tender sympathy with those who represent him here and bear his name speak to us in this vision. When our energies flag, when our hopes grow dim, when discouragements depress the Christian, that vision of the Master is a tonic, a stimulus, of mighty power. It carried Stephen through the trial and malignity and execution, and it is still able to make men bear and do.

WHAT ONE BRAVE LITTLE WOMAN DID

WHAT one brave little woman, filled with desire to help mankind, can do, is exemplified in the life work of Sophie Wright, the New Orleans philanthropist. But for Sophie Wright, that city would have had no free evening school for men and boys. Sophie Wright is herself a working woman. She is lame. She has been self supporting since she was twelve years old; she has been, too, the support of her family. She is gray, looking older than her age. When she was sixteen, she saw the crying need of educational opportunities for the men and boys of New Orleans who are occupied during the day, and she tried to get the public schools to open their doors in the evening to them. Failing in this, although a poor woman, making her living by teaching a day school, she threw open her own doors, and, every evening at seven, was ready to receive students who had no money to pay, and no time during the day to study. After teaching all day for her livelihood, she taught for love's sake at night. She called for volunteer teachers to help her in this work, and her call met with response. Her school grew until it numbered over one thousand men and boys, fathers and sons—men of fifty and tender little boys sitting side by side in the same classes; many came barefoot. It is absolutely free. Her efforts are directed, too, to the spiritual uplift of her scholars. Outside of her educational work she fills an important niche in the life of the city, beyond which her usefulness has found expression in such offices as Secretary of the National Federation of Women's Clubs, and National Secretary of the King's Daughters.

MISS SOPHIE WRIGHT

MISS HELEN PITKIN

Her latest and most picturesque benevolence was turning the recent Carnival to philanthropic account. During Mardi Gras, when great crowds flocked to the city, the King's Daughters, under Miss Wright's leadership, opened a lunch-room and realized a handsome sum toward the erection of a children's annex to the Home of Incurables, an enterprise which the Daughters have long had on their hearts. Miss Pitkin, her earnest coadjutor, is full of good works on her own account. When her church, St. Anna (Protestant Episcopal), on Esplanade avenue, became too poor to employ an organist, Miss Pitkin served as musical director without pay.

A Notable Y.M.C.A. Convention

Railroad Men Assemble at Topeka—An Address by President Roosevelt

TOPEKA, Kan., was the scene, during the closing days of April and the first week in May, of a remarkable gathering. For nearly a week, the meetings of the Railroad Men's Y.M.C.A. Conference packed the great Auditorium. There were 1,250 delegates visiting the city from all parts of the Union, besides a representation from Canada, Mexico, France, Germany and Denmark, and the hundreds of other visitors, including many of the delegates' wives, swelled the total to nearly 1,800.

On Friday, May 1, President Roosevelt addressed the Conference. A great multitude greeted him and listened with closest attention to his speech. Among other things he said:

The last time I ever saw General Sherman, he told me that in the event of a war he could conceive of no better fortune for a general than to have an army composed exclusively of railroad men (applause), because they are men whose profession means that they of necessity would make all great and successful soldiers, having the quality of work, of facing risks, of facing hardships, of combining the capacity to obey and to obey quickly with the capacity of taking responsibility, of acting on individual initiative, just as continually as the need arises.

Further on, the speaker said:

Character! That is what tells in the long run—character which is compounded of many different qualities. In the first place, of perseverance, resolution, refusal to be daunted. There is not a man here who doesn't at times fail, who doesn't meet failure—not one. And the difference between the man and the sham man is that failure daunts the one and merely makes the other try harder to overcome it. That is one side of character. Think for yourselves how much more it means than mind or body. The intellectual man who is afraid can't do anything. He meets an obstacle and he cannot surmount it and he is cowed by it. The man without this mental gift who, instead of being cowed by it, is spurred to fresh effort by its existence, will pass the other in the race of life as sure as the sun rises in the East.

In closing, he said:

I congratulate you, as I say, not only because you are bettering yourselves, but because to you, for your good fortune, it is given to better others, to teach in the way in which teaching is most effective—not merely by precept, but by action. The railroad men of this country are a body entitled to the well wishes of their fellow-men in any event, but peculiarly is this true of the railroad men of the country who join in such work as that of these Young Men's Christian Associations, because they are showing by their actions—and, oh, how much louder actions speak than words—that it is not only possible, but very, very possible and easy to combine the manliness which makes a man able to do his own share of the world's work with that fine and lofty love of one's fellow-men, which makes you able to come together with your fellows and work hand in hand with them for the common good of all, for the common good of mankind in general. I congratulate you.

On Sunday afternoon nearly 4,000 men packed the auditorium, when Fred B. Smith, International Secretary, conducted a religious service. In this meeting it is estimated that two hundred men enrolled themselves as Christians.

In the United States and Canada there are now 197 Associations of the railroad work, of which the operating expenses last year amounted to $502,000. Of this amount, $240,000 was contributed by railroad companies. These Associations have $1,500,000 invested in buildings, toward the erection of which railroad companies contributed about two-thirds of the cost. To such an extent do railroad companies estimate the value of Y. M. C. A. work among their employees that they have shown remarkable liberality in their assistance to it. The companies provided every facility to advance the Convention, but in no case did they have a voice or a vote in the meetings.

Col. John J. McCook was President of the Conference. Among the reported developments of the past two years were the opening of Associations for street railroad men at Rochester and Brooklyn; the organization of an Association in the City of Mexico, and the development in the Southwest, where there are now twelve Associations, with buildings costing $120,000 and with 7,500 members.

"Tom's dying!" moaned Molly. The baby ake up and cried. Nobody noticed.

"No, not dying," said Tom weakly. "Only nocked out of the ring, dear. Bring Benny r me to kiss. I'm going back to camp, olly."

The man tottered to his feet, ghastly white. "Bind me tightly, Phyllis," he commanded. ou know how."

"Tom, dear, you'll not try to go to camp," aded Molly. "I'll go and explain. You ay and let me nurse you. I can't let you Y'd die on the way."

"It isn't death I fear, Molly. It's dishonor. an't leave my boy a stained name. The—un—starts—at daybreak. Get me back to mp, if you love me, Molly."

Aunt Phyllis wasted no time in words. She messed the gray old pony to the farm agon, heaped straw in the bottom for a bed, d almost lifted her master in. Molly mbed up and supported his head. Phyllis ove them to the station. Then, her stout art breaking, she hurried home to look ter Tom's boy.

Ed Mallory was sitting in the tent, puffing his pipe. Morning parade was over. Thus all had gone well. Tom had not been issed.

He looked down the road. The tent was at e head of the company street, the woods ly a little way off. Then his heart stood ill. For slowly walking, step by step, as if ch step were agony, came the ghost, it emed, of Tom MacGregor, and Molly as-sting him, deadly pale, walked by his side. ney reached the tent. Tom lurched forward d Ed caught him.

"Quick, Ed," he whispered. "My uniform. et me into my jacket."

Ed and Molly helped him. When the cket was on he fainted away.

Tom had not actually been missed. Ed as right. But that old fox, the major, had s suspicions and his intuitions. He had st scribbled a note on a pad and sent for an derly to carry a message. The absence om evening drill and morning parade of the e young Marylander, who was the most riking figure in the remnant of his regiment, d not escaped the major's keen observa-n. He resolved to inquire about it. But this moment the major had a shock. Into e tent at headquarters, where he sat with e adjutant, dashed the colonel's wife like a mpest, and threw herself in a sobbing heap, o a chair in front of him.

The major may not have had a heart, but e was a man, and he loathed the sight of an sterical woman.

"Good heavens, madam!" he ejaculated, top crying, and tell me what has happened. ave you had bad news from the colonel?"

"Oh, Major Sutphen, if Jack were only ere," she cried. "It's my fault, every bit of Tom MacGregor's dying in his tent and s wife's there with him; and if it hadn't been r me, he wouldn't have gone away and as needn't have happened. He's wounded, d I'm the one to arrest. I've done it all."

"I never did believe in women fooling ound a camp," growled the major to the djutant, but the colonel's wife did not hear m. When he strode wrathfully out, the djutant following him closely, she shivered d cried a little more, then suddenly dried er eyes and ran after them.

"Wait for me, major," she called. "Let me xplain."

The major did not stop. He strode on, in ngry haste.

At the sight of his approach, men gathered ere and there in knots scattered apart. The reet was quiet as the two officers approached om MacGregor's tent. As they crossed the ll, the burly army surgeon, standing by the ot, held up a peremptory hand.

"Be silent," he said.

Molly was kneeling by the bed. Ed Mallory, ern and grim-visaged, stood at the foot. om lay apparently unconscious, his faded cket open, snow not whiter than his face.

They stood there as if frozen. The major, mpressive and austere, the adjutant, curious et sympathetic, the colonel's wife, her eyes side with apprehension, the doctor waiting he end.

The man on the cot opened his eyes. His and feebly groped for his wife's.

"Good-bye, Molly," he said. "Tell Benny was all right."

Then his glance brightened. He saw the ajor. With superhuman effort, he sat up nd saluted.

"Here, sir!" he cried, fell back on his pil-w and was gone.

Every May time since then, a grieving oman and her boy have laid garlands on a oldier's grave. The woman is counting the ears now, till she meets her hero again. Her oy Benny is a man, and he fought in the panish War. He has the heart of the Mac-regors, and he loves his country.

HEALTH, STRENGTH AND A GOOD FIGURE

ARE MORE TO BE DESIRED THAN A PRETTY FACE

It is just one year since I began to teach physical culture by mail, after 15 years of personal experience in prescribing individual work for women. I have never broken faith with my pupils, but have myself dictated every lesson. Were it not that pupils are thinking their courses daily, I could take no new ones. Fully one-third of the pupils who have worked with me this winter have been recommended to me by pupils who worked with me last year. If your vitality is at a low ebb, if you are troubled with any of the so-called chronic ailments—Constipation, Indigestion, Torpid Liver, Sick Headaches, Nervousness, Sleeplessness—if you are overly large and wish to be reduced and increase your vitality in reducing, if you are thin and want to put on flesh, you can do so by no better means than a course in scientific physical culture. The experience of hundreds of my pupils would bear me out in this. My work is not physical exercise alone. Women do not seek an athlete's strength, but that roundness and symmetry which has made women's form a model for sculptors and painters, and they want that grace and force born of a healthful spirit, which Emerson calls "the ecstacy of life." They want perfect health to make them cheerful wives, helpful companions and better friends.

The following extracts from letters from my pupils are on my desk as I write:

"I believe that my lessons are the best investment I have ever made."

"I just read your last advertisement in a January magazine, and from my own experience I know that you have no more than you accomplish

"Have left off my glasses and my eyes seem to be all right.

"My neck and chest are developing finely. I can scarcely believe it is my own neck.

"My husband says: 'If you had known Miss Cocroft one year ago you should have been saved $1200 doctor bills.'"

"I have lost 25 pounds and I am so happy."

"I used to be so stoop-shouldered, now I carry myself as well as my friends."

"I have not had a headache for four weeks. Menstruation painless and I can apply myself to mental work all day long and not feel tired and nervous. I think I know how to breathe now."

"I sleep all night, for which I cannot adequately express my thanks."

"Have not had a cold this winter. Have lost 20 pounds in flesh. My friends all note the difference in my size."

"My mother has been taking the exercises with me and has had entirely the rheumatism which troubled her so long."

"My constipation is entirely relieved."

"My indigestion has all gone. I can sit down and eat as I have not been for years."

"My complexion is very decidedly clearer and my eyes brighter."

"If the remaining three lessons do me as much good as the first three lessons, you will have done wonders. I am never tired now."

"I wish that more women would wake up and see what could be done for them. I cannot be thankful enough that I have made a start."

"I am still well in the literal sense of the word. Not a cold have I had, and never did I enjoy such wonderful health."

Letters similar to the above come to me from my pupils every day.

If you will write me, I will furnish you with names and addresses of women who have been helped with my work, and for ten cents I will send you a little booklet, showing you correct lines of the body in poise and movement. If you need me or wish to know more of my work, I will cheerfully give you all information I can.

SUSANNA COCROFT, Dept. 214, 57 Washington St., Chicago

NOTE.—Miss Cocroft is President of the Extension Work in Physical Culture. This position has given her a wide experience in personal work.

OUR MAIL BAG

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Reader, Hennessey, Okla. If such a flood of immigration continues to come to this country as is mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will it not in time become a menace to our government?

It need not be a menace if properly regulated. The laws concerning immigration may be expected to become more and more stringent, as time advances. If the dangerous elements are excluded, the immigration, with few exceptions, will be such as will be quickly absorbed by our population. It is estimated that nearly a million immigrants will arrive this year.

W. H. McD., Bloomingburg, N. Y. What was the population of Jerusalem in the time of Christ? Also the population at the present day?

There is considerable room for difference of opinion relative to the population of ancient Jerusalem. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that at the time of the siege there were 3,000,000, but Tacitus declares there were not over 600,000. Both statements are evidently greatly wide of the mark. The normal population in Christ's time is estimated to have been about 30,000 to 45,000. At festivals, and in times of great national excitement, these figures would be doubled or trebled. At the present time the population is somewhere between 25,000 and 30,000.

H. T. C., Atlantic, Ia. 1. What is the difference between the condition of a person who has died impenitent before and after the resurrection? 2. How is it possible for an earlier date than 4004 B.C., to be on the newly discovered stone, when, according to our reference Bibles, Adam was created in that year?

1. Very little light is given in the Bible on the condition of the departed. God does not satisfy our curiosity on those matters. The Bible was given to teach us how we might gain eternal life, and how we ought to live in this world. Apparently God wished us to exercise faith in him as to the world beyond the grave. The inferences we draw from some passages, however, lead us to believe that the disembodied spirit, whether of those who are saved or of those who are lost, does not enter fully into its eternal condition until it has received the body referred to in I Cor. 15:53, which takes place at the resurrection. Probably we are as incapable of understanding that world even if it had been explained to us, as an ant would be of understanding human life. 2. The dates in the margins of the reference Bibles earlier than the time of Solomon 1015 B.C. are worthless. They were worked out by Archbishop Ussher in 1650 before the era of exploration. They are certainly wrong, but as yet we cannot say how far wrong.

T. T. E., Sabbatha, Kan. 1. Is the Christian religion a blessing to the home and family if, as some assert, death "is an eternal sleep"? 2. A farmer sells grain to a dealer, who cheats in weight. In selling, the dealer makes a mistake in the farmer's favor. Ought the farmer to pay it back or let it go to even the score?

1. Irrespective of all other considerations, it is a blessing to the home and family, as it inculcates honor, purity, domestic affection and concord. But Christianity is inseparable from its precepts. It is based on the resurrection, and without Christ as a risen Saviour it would be meaningless. 2. Two wrongs can not make a right. The farmer should call the dealer's attention to two facts—the shortage in weight and the error in price, and then ask him to make the matter right.

Old Preacher. What can I do for a living, and to best serve my Master? I am sixty-five years old, white-headed, but strong and healthy. What can I do? Where can I go?

It is probably useless to lament over the fact, now widely recognized, that the average church prefers a young and vigorous pastor to one who is nearing the borderland, and whose long experience of life and its problems should make his counsel doubly precious. "Old heads for counsel," should have a more practical application in spiritual work than it now receives. The old saint can draw more and deeper lessons from experience than the young, the callow, the untried. He may not be able to "cover the ground" literally, as the younger man does, but to the depressed, the unhappy, the sick or the dying, his words of advice and comfort would fall with a more convincing power. We can conceive of no mission more gracious for a venerable Christian to perform than this.

Subscriber, Winchelsea, Ont. 1. Does the command to baptize given in Matt. 28:19, Mark 16:16, and other places, refer to baptism with water? 2. Had the apostles power to baptize with the Holy Spirit?

1. Though it is not explicitly stated, the natural inference from the passage is that baptism by water is intended. The expression baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost was not likely to be used if the baptism referred to was of the Holy Spirit. 2. We would rather say that the Holy Spirit was given in answer to the apostles' prayers, though possibly some passages might warrant the statement as you give it. At Samaria it is stated (Acts 8:17) that Peter and John laid their hands on the converts and "they received the Holy Ghost." Again, Paul at Ephesus (Acts 19:6) having "laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came upon them."

A NOTABLE SOUTHERN SUNDAY SCHOOL CLASS

Here is a class of bright girls, who are taught by Mr. Thayer, of the Methodist Sunday School of Greenwood, Miss. The class was formed in 1896, and there have been enrolled twenty-eight names. When a girl is enrolled as a member, the first requirement is that she must have a Bible of her own; second, she must bring it to the class. Not only is the lesson taught direct from the Bible (no lesson papers are allowed in the class-room), but a portion of the lesson hour is devoted to a drill upon the construction of the Book and the many beautiful things to be found in it; thus a love for the old Book is woven into the life. Each scholar is required to read a portion of the Book every day, and Bible readings are prepared and given out each Sunday; thus the girl forms the habit of daily reading, and is prepared to do service for the Master. Some of these girls have grown to womanhood and have gone out to preside over homes of their own. Who can tell the influence of a home presided over by a woman who has "Hid God's Word in her heart?"

M. S. T., Denver, Colo. 1. Is one justified in dwelling on a past mistake. For instance, one lets an opportunity pass, which might have been a great blessing, and afterward does the thing which he neglected to do, but under less favorable circumstances. He feels that he has done right, but is troubled with pangs of regret, and sometimes feels very sad because he did not do it before, and at a particular time. How can he keep from being melancholy on this account? 2. If a person united with the church with a few others and in the presence of a few witnesses, and afterward a large company unite with the church, has he a right to regret not having waited until the latter date, that he, too, might have been numbered with the large company?

1. It does no good whatsoever to mourn over past sins. If you have asked God to forgive them for Christ's sake, and have asked in faith, then you should resolutely put them behind you. 2. Such regrets are vain and foolish. The other questions in your letter show that they refer to a person who is extremely self-conscious, and so committed to the habit of introspection that unless he gets out of it and goes bravely to work for Christ in any way that offers itself, he will make little spiritual progress. Physical work develops the muscles, and Christian work develops the spiritual part of man. Stop moping, trust God, pray often, cease to live for yourself and to continually think of yourself, and begin right away to help others. Then all these morbid ideas will quickly vanish, and give place to an energetic and hopeful view of life and its duties.

Daisy, Hankinson, N. Dak. Is it wrong for second cousins to marry?

The relationship is within the limit of ecclesiastical proscription, though there is no civil law against such a union. It is, however, inadvisable on the ground of consanguinity. The issue of such marriages is apt to be intellectually and physically inferior.

Mr. A. M., Minneapolis, Minn., a reader of this journal, sends this seasonable suggestion:

Very shortly the hot sultry weather, with all its exhausting effects, will be here, and as is the case every year, the suffering and anguish will be very great that will have to be endured by thousands of those who are compelled to live in the crowded and congested parts of the city. In many cases very few spaces are left for breathing and recreation grounds. Doubtless in the poorer and congested parts of the large cities, there are many vacant lots that might be utilized as breathing and recreation grounds for children and others. I sincerely hope that the citizens will do all in their power to urge and aid this noble cause, and by so doing much misery and suffering will be avoided. Last year the city of Chicago greatly benefited its inhabitants, by opening several small parks in its various densely crowded districts.

An excellent suggestion, indeed all of our large cities should have as many "breathing spots" as possible. Meanwhile, to save the children of the tenements while the greater reforms are still unrealized, our Children's Fresh-Air Home at Mont Lawn is doing all it can every year to make the lives of the poor little slum waifs happier, and to decrease the rate of juvenile mortality. Mont-Lawn is a veritable Children's Park—a beautiful spacious rural paradise in the highlands of the Hudson. It will open this month to receive its little tenement guests.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. Who was Massillon, to whom preachers occasionally refer in their sermons?

He was a famous French preacher, born in 1663. The preachers of his time were generally inefficient, and those about the court were flatterers of the king. He was an earnest, sincere, pious man, a great admirer of Bourdaloue, the eloquent orator, whom he resembled. When summoned to preach before King Louis XIV, and subsequently before King Louis XV, he uttered plain gospel truth which it was thought would be offensive to king and court. It was spoken, however, so gently and sweetly, that the preacher escaped admonition. He was appointed Bishop of Clermont, and died greatly beloved in 1742, at the age of seventy-nine.

S. McC., Newark, O. 1. What is the difference between a melodeon and an organ? When were they invented, and by whom? 2. When was the first pipe organ built and where? 3. Who invented the piano and when? 4. Could you tell me where I could get a copy of The Sky Pilot, bound in the cheap edition?

1. The music in the first is made by reeds, in the other by pipes. The harmonium was first used in France early in the last century; the organ much earlier. 2. Pipe organs have been built for over 1200 years. Large organs on the present lines were built as early as 1516. 3. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

INDIA'S CHILDREN ARE HER HOPE

Our Army of Five Thousand Orphans May Yet Bring Her Unevangelized Millions to Christ

CHEERING and hopeful news continues to come from India, of the results of the magnificent work being done there among the orphans through the beneficence of the readers of this journal. The missionaries are delighted with the opportunity afforded them of caring for the children, and educating them in the Christian faith; and the children are showing wonderful intelligence, and are not only availing themselves of the educational facilities placed within their reach, but are giving themselves to Christ with a true and sincere consecration. Who can tell what will be the effect on the people of India when these five thousand orphans go forth into the towns and villages of the country to live Christian lives, and in many cases to preach and teach their fellow-countrymen!

Miss S. F. Gardner, Secretary of the India work of the Woman's Union Missionary Society, who is now visiting this country, reports excellent progress. In the schools and orphanages connected with the society in Calcutta, Cawnpore, and other parts of India, there are fifty-three orphans supported by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. She says: "If, as we believe, a large part of the work of winning India for Christ is to be taken by the one million native Christians registered in India at the latest census, how important is the work of educating and training the great army of native children for the service! Out of the sad and distressing experience of the people in the recent famine has come this providential opportunity, in which so many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already interested.

"Many of the famine children and young people now in our Christian institutions, are exceptionally bright and interesting. I personally know some of them, both boys and girls, who have grown into a vigorous physical life, and bid fair, under proper training, to grow up into useful men and women. I asked a fellow-worker, who had some specially fine-looking boys of ten or twelve years of age under her care, what she was going to do with them. 'Prepare them to go back to work among their own people,' was her very prompt reply. They may not all go as preachers, but they will go as Christians, and their influence will be for Christianity whatever their occupation, and many, no doubt, will go directly as evangelists. Now, my suggestion to those who have sent money to feed and clothe these little ones, and have thus been used of God to save them from starvation, is this: Still continue to support them till they are launched into a healthy life of usefulness, as well as into a healthy, physical life. At least, find out from those who have the care of those you have rescued, your special boy or girl, and see if they are not worth, at least, a primary education, or if they may not be carried on in their studies and training, till you have put into the field an evangelist, a doctor or a nurse. Keep in touch with them, and help them till they are able to help themselves.

"The second thing of which I wish to speak and to enlist the sympathies of at least the women readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is the education and training of Christian women, to work among non-Christian women. There are one hundred and forty millions of women in India who can neither read nor write, so they cannot be approached with the written word. Forty millions of these are shut up in zenanas. Twenty-seven millions of them are widows, and the only way to reach them is through the agency of their own sex. The few foreign women missionaries cannot, of course, touch the fringe of this great mass of women; it can only be done through their own Christian sisters; and India's Christian women must be trained and educated to meet this great responsibility.

"The work of women, since it does not include public preaching, is necessarily more in the line of teaching, and is largely made up of Bible teaching in zenanas and in Hindu and Mohammedan day schools. In villages where they can gather large numbers of women together, it is more nearly allied to preaching, is purely evangelistic. They do much of the work in Christian boarding and day schools, as teachers, matrons and general supervisors. We wish to train the children not only for teachers, but for leaders. We must bring to the front those who will be able to take places of responsibility, and be able to organize and to carry out schemes for service among their fellow-countrywomen. The writer has under her charge two schools, one for primary and one for the higher education of Christian girls and women, and there have been notable results from both. Twelve hundred Hindu girls gathered in day schools in every part of the city of Calcutta, are nearly all taught by teachers educated and trained in one or the other of these schools. The teachers in the schools themselves are old pupils, the head mistress of the school for higher education is a Christian Bengali lady, an M.A. of the Calcutta University, a degree she took by carrying on her own studies while doing the work of the school. She is an 'all-round,' capable, practical woman, as well as an educated one.

"The Christian women have good stuff in them, but it needs more direction and training, and our schools for this purpose need help. I think it was Ex-President Harrison who said, in speaking of a college educated woman, of India, whom he met in this country at the time of the Ecumenical Conference, 'If I had given a million dollars to foreign missions, I should count it wisely invested if it led only to the conversion of that one woman.'"

A LITTLE ONE RESCUED FROM FAMINE — A CHRISTIAN WHO HAS CHARGE OF 100 LITTLE HINDU GIRLS — TWO BENGALI BIBLE WOMEN

A SCHOOL OF HINDU GIRLS IN CALCUTTA

In charge of a native Christian woman, who stands in the background of the picture

Of all helpers of the people of India, those who have the largest opportunity of individual usefulness, especially to women, are the Christian physicians. They can enter the zenanas, in which the native secludes his wife, and can not only relieve suffering, but can tell the sufferer of the Divine Physician. Large numbers of benighted women have in this way been won for Christ, and have in their turn won others. It has, therefore, been very gratifying to this journal, that its readers have responded to the invitation to help the young medical student from India to complete her studies in the Philadelphia college. We are glad to report also, that from Rev. Charles Phillips of Georgia, a devoted friend of India, sufficient funds have been received to pay for the education of two native medical students. Another reader of this journal has promised to educate a third, as a memorial of a beloved sister. All these will be carefully selected by the missionaries from among native Christian students who are eager to gain medical knowledge. Their piety as well as their intelligence will be taken into account in the selection. They will be educated at the North India School of Medicine for Women at Ludhiana in the Punjab, an institution which has abundantly proved its efficiency by the high standing its graduates have taken at the examinations.

There are two girls of the Brahmin caste now in the Ludhiana College studying for a medical career. The story of one of them is thrilling. Her name is Indu, and her father owns considerable property. He allowed her to attend a mission school when she was four or five years old, and there she learned to read, and memorized hymns and texts. As she grew older she was able to read the Gospel, and not only that, but she truly believed on the Lord Jesus as her Saviour. But her parents were already arranging for her marriage, which could not long be delayed, otherwise the whole family would have considered themselves disgraced. Poor little Indu pleaded that they would wait, or else that they would give her to the Miss Sahibs and let her be a Christian. But her father only laughed at her. Her married sisters, too, were much distressed at the possibility of disgrace to their name, and urged the father to hasten the final ceremonies.

The poor child could do nothing. She said very pitifully, "I was defeated." That year she was married, and the next the final ceremony took place, and she was sent to the home of a rich Brahmin boy near Calcutta. After she had been there three days, she quietly stepped out of the house, hoping to find her way to her teacher. As soon as her father-in-law found out that she had gone, he was angry and distressed. He sent notices to the railway stations and to the police, describing her, and offering a reward if she was brought back. He also sent to the Mission House, but she had not been seen there. Meanwhile the poor child was walking as fast as she could towards Calcutta. She had not enough money to take the train, but towards evening, being hungry, she stopped at a shop to buy some pice-worth of food, and there she was overtaken and recognized. She was taken back to her father-in-law. When he heard that she had been with the Christians, he refused to have anything to do with her, saying: "Her caste is broken, she is good for nothing now; any one may have her."

How glad Indu was when she heard his answer. She was baptized, and after studying well she came to the medical school. She has now passed her first professional examination in Lahore, and we believe that she has a bright future of happy service before her. No one can do more good to the women of India than a woman, able at the same time to cure the sick and preach the Gospel. May there be many such among the orphans who have been rescued. Our friends, in providing the necessary funds for such training, have set an example which we hope will be extensively followed.

HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE

A Sermon by REV. R. A. TORREY

Of the Bible Institute, Chicago

JOSHUA 1: 8—This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein

YOU will find in these words the secret of victory in life and power in service, the secret of prosperity and success. It all comes from the proper study of the Word of God. A man who studies the Word of God as he ought will prosper in his way, and succeed in his work. "But," you may say, "a man may study the Word of God and not obey it." He cannot study it as he ought and not obey it. I said, if a man should study the Bible as he ought; and we shall see directly that that involves obedience to it.

There is nothing more important than Christian life and Christian service than Bible study. But not all Bible study is equally profitable. There is a good deal of so-called Bible study that is absolutely profitless, if not worse than profitless. Mr. Moody said to a graduate of one of our American universities one day, "Why don't you give up your life to teaching the English Bible? You have more money than you know what to do with." "Why," said the young man, "I don't know anything about the Bible." "But," replied Mr. Moody, "down in your university you have a high-priced professor who is paid to teach you the English Bible." "I know it, and I have attended his classes; but would you like to know how we have studied it? We have been studying the last six months to find out who wrote the Bible, and we know less about it than when we commenced." That is not very profitable Bible study; it is not Bible study at all. It is studying about the Bible; it is not studying the Bible.

My first point is this: study your Bible with a surrendered will. I shall not say anything more important than that this morning. Study your Bible with a will wholly surrendered to God. One of the greatest secrets of Bible study is found in John vii. 17: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." There is nothing that clears the mental and spiritual eye to understand and appreciate the Word of God like a will wholly surrendered to God. A surrendered will will do more to prepare you for profitable Bible study than a university and theological education. A man may know all about Greek and Latin and Hebrew, all about the languages in which the Bible is written, but unless his will is surrendered to God he will be blind to the meaning of the Book. But if a man is surrendered to the will of God he will be able to get to the meaning of the Book, which is so admirably translated, even if he does not know a word of Greek or Hebrew.

A Surrendered Will

I have seen people who had that clear spiritual vision that came from a surrendered will, at whose feet I would far rather sit to learn what God really said in His Word than at the feet of a great many of the Professors of Hebrew and Greek. They knew more about the real force and sweetness of God's Word than those very learned professors who had not the clear eye that came from an absolutely surrendered will. Now, unless you are going to put in practice what I have said on this point, it will not do you any good to listen to the other points. I repeat it, then, the very first condition of profitable Bible study is a surrendered will.

Now, if you will turn to Jas. 1: 21, 22, you will find my second thought. "Wherefore, lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls. But be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." Study the Word of God obediently, with daily obedience to its teaching. Put away all sin and do what the Word says. A great many people come to me with difficulties in the Bible, and say, "What does this mean?" I reply, "It means what it says." But the trouble is, they do not want to do what it says; they want to do something else, and therefore they have a great deal of difficulty with the Word of God. A very large share of our difficulties in the teaching of the Word of God is an unwillingness to do just what it says. When you find anything commanded in that Book—that is, if it is commanded of you, of course; that which is commanded of the Jew under the old dispensation is not commanded of the Christian under the new dispensation oftentimes—then do it.

"Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. For if any man be a hearer of the Word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was." In other words, James says, "The Bible is a looking-glass, given you to show you how you look." What is the use of a looking-glass? It is not to puff up your vanity, but to show you if there is anything out of place with your face or your general appearance, and if so, that you may straighten it out. That is what the Bible is for, to reveal you to yourself, to show you the things that are not in harmony with God's will, that you may straighten them out.

And let me say right here, friends, that if you come to anything that is commanded in God's own Word and do not do it, the whole Book is going to be sealed right up. It is wonderful how disobedience to any verse in God's Word shuts all the rest of the verses up to you, and it is equally wonderful how obedience to one verse after another, as you understand it, opens up the whole Book. So my second point is, study the Bible with daily obedience to its teaching. Every time you find anything taught in the Word of God, take your stand upon it, and do it.

Daily Study

Now, turn to Acts 17: 11: "These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." Study your Bible daily. Never let twenty-four hours go over your head under any circumstances without studying your Bible. I will tell you what makes a Bible student; it is everlastingly keeping at it, pegging away and pegging away. I heard one of our greatest workers amongst our young men in America say one day that after all the Bible conferences he had attended—and he had attended eighteen—he got most blessing out of one at which there were only four persons present, himself and three others. They covenanted together at the close that they would study the Bible every day, and he said, "I have kept that promise, and the greatest blessing out of any conference has come from it."

Have a regular set time every day for studying your Bible. That may be varied under some circumstances, but, as far as possible, hold to it. It is a very simple thing, but of immense consequence. You have a regular time for your breakfast, and a regular time for your dinner, and you keep to it. That is, you do if you have good sense. I know some people who take their meals whenever it comes handy to them, and wind up as dyspeptics. I know other people who have sense enough to have a regular time to eat, and they eat when that time comes round. Well, it is far more important spiritually than it is physically.

Have a Regular Time

every day that is set apart for God and his Word, to get in your orders from God. Do not take the time just before you go to bed. It is a good thing to read a little bit before you go to bed as a sort of comfort for the night, but do not take that time for your Bible study. The mind is at its worst at night. It often has a sort of unnatural activity, but that is not the kind of activity you want for Bible study. If you possibly can, take it when you first get up, when the mind is clearest, when it is at its very best.

Set a certain length of time. It may be only a quarter of an hour, but you can accomplish a great deal if you set apart fifteen minutes every day. Better still, half an hour; better still, a whole hour; better still, two hours; but I am not going to expect you to do that. Some people say, "It is all very well for you preachers you have all the time—you do not have anything to do. Lord Cairns, a former Lord Chancellor of Great Bri ain, a very busy man, put it on record before he die that he had given the first two hours of every day t prayer and the study of the Word of God. He sai "Whatever success I may have had in my life"—and h was one of the most successful statesmen—"I attribut it more than anything else to the fact that the first tw hours of every day has been given to prayer and th study of the Word of God."

Now turn to I. Thess. 2: 13: "For this cause also than we God without ceasing, because, when ye receive th Word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not the word of men, but as it is in truth, the Word of Go which effectually worketh also in you that believe Paul here thanks God that the Thessalonian believer received God's Word as God's Word. That is my ne point: Study the Bible as the Word of God. If yo are not convinced that the Bible is the Word of God, do not tell you not to study it, for I do not know an thing better to convince a man that the Bible is th Word of God than to study the Bible itself. The gre trouble with these people who are pulling the Bible t pieces to-day is, that they do not know anything abo it. So I say, if you do not believe the Bible is th Word of God, study the Bible; it is the best way to g convinced. I did not much believe it was God's Wor when I commenced, but as I really studied it—not merel speaking about it, as I had in olden times—I knew th whatever men and women said, there was a wisdom i it, a power to get hold of the heart, an appeal to mysel that was from God.

Exercise Faith

But if you have got to the place, as most of you hav where you do believe that the Bible is the Word of Go study it as God's Word. What do I mean by that First of all, that you will believe everything it says, n matter how difficult it may be for your finite reason t comprehend how it can be so. Nothing is more irration than to subject the teaching of infinite wisdom to the powe of comprehension of finite wisdom. Rationalism, s called, is the most irrational thing the world over, for says that we must measure the teachings of infinite wi dom by the power of comprehension of a little finite ma "I won't believe anything that I can't understand." Wh are you, that think you can understand everything th infinite wisdom says? If I had a Bible that had nothin in it that was beyond me, I should very much questio whether it was the work of an infinite God; the ver simplicity of it would make me believe it was by ma

In the second place, it means that you are to believ every one of its promises, without disturbing one pa of it. What a way we have of coming to some promis and because it is so great, so vast, so magnificent, w say, "It cannot mean that," and we begin to tone down. How dare you discount the promises of Go who cannot lie?

It means in the third place, that you shall obey it mediately and unquestionably every commandment yo find in the Book, when once you understand it.

In the fourth place, it means that when you read th Bible you read it as in God's presence, and instead reading something written coldly in a book, you see living Person, your own heavenly Father, standin there and saying it to you. It is God talking to you. tell you that goes an immense way towards making th Bible a new book. I used to read my Bible in such cold way, but I learned to read it as my Father sayin something to me; two persons—I one, the insignifica one; He the other, the glorious One. It is no longer Book written eighteen centuries ago, but a living Go my Father, talking to me to-day. Learn to read yo Bible that way, so that it is a personal God talking to you. There is freshness in the Book then.

Prayerful Study.

It is a good thing to read your Bible on your knee as in God's presence. I wonder if I will be misunde stood; I do not think I will in an audience like th It has been my privilege to read every verse of th Bible on my knees, to read the whole Book through on my knees. I bless good that it has.

In Ps. 119: 18, you will find the next point on Bib study: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wo drous things out of thy law." Study your Bible pray fully. That ought to go without saying, but unfort nately it does not always go with saying. It is a ve commonplace thing to say; but, friends, do you do i The great interpreter of the Bible is the Holy Spir Jesus says, in John 16: 12-14, "I have yet many thing say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbe when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide yo into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; b whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and will show you things to come. He shall glorify me: f

JEWS OF MOROCCO MEASURING GRAIN

THE MARKET-PLACE AT LARISH

CAMEL CARAVAN CROSSING THE SEBU RIVER

Moorish Tribesmen Attack the Jews

IT is a somewhat remarkable coincidence that about the time the anti-Semitic riots were taking place in Russia, similar disturbances, though on a smaller scale, were occurring in Morocco, as this letter, just received from Missionary Weiss, shows:

"TANGIER, MOROCCO, April 30.

"It was a beautiful night when Mr. Currall and I boarded a steamer that lay at anchor in the bay of Tangier. The moon was low in the west and the lights of the city shone out upon the bay, while from the minaret floated the call to the Moors to come to prayers.

"Our boat lifted anchor at midnight, and at dawn the next morning we came in sight of the town of Larish. We went ashore and met some of the English and American brethren who are still in this coast town, unable to get back to their work in the interior. While in Larish, we decided to visit Mequinez and Fez, and to work in the villages along the way. Mr. Taylor, a Scotch missionary, arranged to go with us. After engaging pack mules for $15 each, we were ready to start. All our clothing and camping dishes were packed on the side of the saddle, and we sat on top, each animal thus carrying about 300 pounds.

"After traveling a short time, we came to a valley many miles long and several miles wide, where the Sultan of Morocco has in pasture some of the finest horses and cattle that are to be seen in Morocco. Most of the afternoon was spent in riding through this beautiful valley and admiring the live stock. At evening time we reached the town of El Kazar, and pitched our tent inside the walled city. Soon after leaving El Kazar, we had to ford a river. Many Moorish women and men were at work on the shores, washing clothes, by beating them on the rocks and stamping upon them.

"We had traveled until 10:30 A.M., when we met a number of excited Jews, who had fled from a country market-place which was being raided by tribesmen. They told us how some had been robbed, others beaten and some even killed. To go ahead, they said, would bring us into certain danger, as our road led right through the market; so we took another course. We traveled until 4 P.M., and then pitched our tent in a village, where we got some eggs from the people and made tea. Several men with fire-arms voluntarily slept around our tent to protect us and our animals; yet we could not put our trust in these, for should our Heavenly Father fail to watch over us, how vain would that help of man be!

"The following morning we went through the district where the market was broken up the day before. We prayed much all the morning. We journeyed for a while with a camel caravan that was going to Fez, but it went too slow for our animals, so we decided to push ahead at 10.30 A.M. We passed through the dangerous place, but no one molested us.

"At 3 P.M., we crossed the river Sebu, our caravan being ferried across the deep stream. The natives continually yelled and beat the camels, while they were getting them into the boats. After crossing, we journeyed on till nearly 5 P.M. and then halted at a village with a caravan that was taking sugar to Fez.

"When we had pitched our tents, the people gathered around us. One of the head men of the village, who was nearly blind, came into our tent and broke bread with us in token of welcome, fellowship and love. He invited us out to see a field of beans of a large growth, but we discovered that he had made up a plot with another man to steal our mules while we were gone, so our men kept a close eye on the animals in our absence. On returning, we entered our tent, and it was not long before we heard voices yelling and screaming. We rushed from our tent to see the horse thief getting away on an animal he had stolen from a sugar caravan. The men of the caravan implored us to help them. We demanded the return of the stolen animal, threatening to report the affair to the Sultan. They promised to bring it, but we started away, leaving the load of sugar, thus making them responsible for all.

"After traveling about two hours, we met three hundred of the Sultan's soldiers going to Tangier. Shortly after our meeting with the soldiers, a man came from the village begging us to return and we could have the animal and they would kill a sheep and make a feast. We refused, but demanded that they should bring the horse to the village, where we would camp that night, which they did on the following day, sugar and all.

"On the following day we set out to go to Mequinez, but the road was very bad. Many robberies had occurred lately. So at noon we decided to leave the road and then we took the highway for Fez. That night we stopped at a Kaid's house, and while we were drinking tea with him several men came in from Mequinez, telling the Kaid that the Zemmur tribe had broken into the Jews' quarters at Mequinez and were killing them and carrying away all their goods from the shops. Poor Jews! How they do suffer in North Africa, from the hands of the sons of Ishmael.

"The country we were now in was not in the best condition. On the preceding day a man had been killed, and this meant more tribal trouble for that day. We thought it best not to go to Fez, as we might not be able for a long time to get back to Tangier. We left the Kaid's place and traveled until noon, which brought us out on the Sharada plains. Here we camped by a village for the day, and had a service in the evening. We rested on the following day, preaching and working among the people.

"The Sharada plain resembles the wheat growing portions of Kansas. A great deal of wheat and barley is grown here, and with proper machinery and good men this would make a grand country. Near here oil wells have been found, also coal, but on account of the disturbed condition of the country no one can work them.

"We distributed Bible portions here and on our way back to Larish. We reached Tangier after being gone nearly four weeks from our families.

"We trust the time will come when we can travel with greater safety through the country. We are in need of two good pack mules and tents, also a portable camping outfit. It may be some of your readers have such things and have but little use for them. They would be a great blessing to us in spreading the light of the Gospel in Morocco. FRED WEISS."

...e shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you." "But," you say, "that promise was made to the apostles." Very well, turn to 1 John 2: 20-27, and you will find that one of the apostles takes it and applies it to every believer. He says, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things." It is the privilege of every believer to have the Holy Spirit, who is the Author of the Book, to be its interpreter every time you read it. Suppose you had a book written by some man you liked very much, and suppose he came round, and you had the opportunity of going through it with the man who wrote it, having him explain it and throw light on the things he had said, would that not be a great privilege?

I have been a student of the Book for upwards of a quarter of a century. In a sense, I have studied it longer, for I studied it long before I was converted. I studied it when I was thirteen, and there has not a day passed since when I have not studied it; but for upwards of a quarter of a century I have studied it as a regenerate man. Yet, do you know? I do not think to this day I even open it to glance at it without lifting my heart to God, and praying the Psalmist's prayer, "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law." How many a passage that was difficult and troublesome has become full of most sweet and precious truth since I began to study my Bible that way.

I remember once I was traveling in Germany—I was a student in one of the universities there—and was making a tour of certain caves with some companions. One day we met the village postman. He said, "Would you not like to see a cave that is not down in the guide book?" We said, "Yes"; so away we struck through the brush and came to the cave. It was dark as midnight. He said, "It is perfectly beautiful. Every formation is an altar of the Druidical times," and so forth and so on. "Look out! there is a hole right there, and nobody has ever found the bottom of it." We looked up; we were afraid we would be the first to find the bottom. There was nothing at all pleasant about it; everything was dark and uncanny. But our guide just took a bit of magnesium and lit it, and suddenly the dark, cold, forbidding, dangerous place became luminous, and the stalactites came down from the ceiling to meet the stalagmites as they came up from the floor. Every one was an altar, not a Druidical altar, as they supposed, but an altar built by the hand of God. It was a place of marvelous beauty.

It is just so with the Word of God. How often we come to a passage which looks dark, forbidding, and dangerous. You are often afraid that you will fall into some pitfall; but just look up to God in prayer, and let that passage be illuminated with the light of the Holy Ghost, and it becomes full of beauty, transcendent and glorious. To me, to-day, some of the most precious passages in the Word of God are passages I used to be afraid of. Prayer is the secret of illuminating the Word of God by the Holy Spirit.

The next thing I wish to say you will find in Psalm 1: 2: "But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night." I want to emphasize that word "meditate." Study your Bible thoughtfully. That is a very commonplace thing to say, but it is a very important thing. What I mean is this: when you come to a verse in the Word of God, turn it over, and over, and over. Weigh the meaning of the words. Take, for example, the most familiar passage in the Bible, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want." More people quote that at meetings where I go than any other. Did you ever take it and meditate upon it? Weigh the words one by one. Who is it is my Shepherd? Jehovah. Did you ever turn that over and dwell upon the power and the wisdom and the love and tenderness of Jehovah, your Shepherd? That is worth thinking of for an hour. Then, what is Jehovah? He is my Shepherd. Did you ever stop to think what a shepherd meant? what a shepherd's relation to his sheep was? Then, that little word "my." Have you underscored that in your Bible? "I shall not want." "I shall not want." "I shall not want." "I shall not want."

Take that passage which is so often quoted, "My God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." Who is the supplier? God, my God. "My God shall supply," or, as the Revised Version reads, "fulfil." Turn that round and you have the exact meaning of the word, "fill full." "My God shall supply all your need," or, as the Revised Version has it, "every need," every physical need, every temporal need, every intellectual need, every spiritual need. Now the measure of the supply, "According to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." Mediate on the Word of God.

Now, I want to give you a few rules for meditation. First, never read too fast. One book read properly, is worth tons of books skimmed through. That which is not worth reading slowly and thoughtfully, is not worth reading at all. The average man reads too many books. The great fault of our modern system of education is cramming people with a little about chemistry, a little about philosophy, a little about geology, a little about astronomy, a little about Greek, a little about algebra, and so on. People think they know everything, and they do not properly know a thing. The average boy or girl comes out of school to-day, and knows a little about everything and not much about anything. But, friends, it is pre-eminently true about this Book: the one book you cannot race through is the Bible. Do not read too fast. That is the danger of having so many chapters to read through each day. That kind of thing has spoilt more Bible students than any other. "I have got through my three chapters," you say; "I will go to bed now." Of course you will run your eye over the three chapters, but there is nothing in it. I think far better than setting yourself so many chapters, is to set so much time apart for reading. Sometimes you will not get through more than one verse, but you will have that verse. Do not read too fast: take time.

Another thing that will help you is to mark your Bible. Read with your pen in your hand—not pencil, because pencil rubs out—looking for something to mark, a word, a sentence, a verse. I mark my Bible every day. Why? Not necessarily because I shall come back over the marks, but because it helps me to concentrate my thought at the time of reading. And reading the Bible thus, obediently, prayerfully, thoughtfully, you will reap the reward promised of beholding "wondrous things" out of God's law. May it be so! Amen.

"The Word of God is Not Bound"

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 14
ACTS 28: 16-24, 30, 31

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT:
"I AM NOT ASHAMED OF THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST." ROM. 1: 16

THE Bible in chains has been a familiar scene in history, and so we are not surprised when we go back to its origin and find that much of it was written by Paul's chained hands in providential prisons. The traveler may to-day enter Paul's house in Rome, where he lived as a prisoner with the soldiers that guarded him. Let us walk along the famous Corso, until we come to the Via Lata, where we shall find the church of Santa Maria, built over the remains of Paul's house. We enter the church, and descend a long stairway before we reach the house. In Paul's time it was not underground, but it has become like a cellar because of the debris which has gathered in nineteen hundred years. The house is divided into three rooms, one larger than the other two, all covering a space not over thirty feet square. The walls are large blocks of travertine, now blackened with age. It all seems very real, especially when the visitor is shown the places worn by the feet of the guards.

A ROMAN SOLDIER

When Paul with other prisoners reached Rome, while the others were put in dungeons, he was allowed to hire this house and live there with only a single guard, because he was a Roman and under no serious charge. After Paul had been in Rome three days, he called all the Jews in the city to meet him in that house and explain his arrest and imprisonment, telling them that although he had accepted Christ as the promised Messiah, he had not discarded Jewish laws and customs, but had been mobbed by the Scribes and Pharisees, while he was in the very act of fulfilling a Jewish vow, and had been accused falsely before the Romans, who had rescued him, of trampling on the law and the prophets, whose fulfilment he had rejoiced to find in Christ. He further told them that the Roman judges found no crime in him, but tried to please the Jews by proposing he should be tried in Jerusalem, where a band of assassins waited to slay him, and he had therefore appealed to Cæsar, but for which he would subsequently have been set free, as not guilty of anything worthy of death or of bonds. "For the hope of Israel," exclaimed Paul, "I am bound with this chain."

The Roman Jews were ready to hear him, though the believers in the Nazarene as the promised Messiah were "everywhere spoken against." They came at appointed times for two years and heard Paul expound the prophetic pictures of the Old Testament as fulfilled in Jesus, the King of the long promised kingdom of God, which is the kingdom of social justice and brotherhood. Some believed, and others rejected the message and the Master. During this time no serious effort was made by Jews or Romans to suppress his message. The Jews who had silenced him by a mob at Jerusalem had only given the message wider scope, as have all efforts to suppress the Gospel, for "the Word of God is not bound," not even when its herald is put in chains. Here at Rome Paul wrote Colossians, Philippians, Philemon, and 2d Timothy—the last at least when his prison was no longer his own house but a dismal dungeon. And let us remember that Luke's gospel and Acts were written when a prison companion of Paul. No wonder a book which prisons could not check in the writing, has defied prisons to check in the reading. "The Word of God is not bound."

Illustration and Application

Two great truths, which history abundantly proves and illustrates, are presented by this lesson: First, that God can make persecutions and prisons into providences; second, that the Word of God cannot be bound. The hatred of God and the good in men who are wilfully bad is the same in every age. But God's power to overrule this wrath of man to his praise and the blessing of the world is also the same yesterday, to-day and forever. In the case of our lesson, Jews who had rejected and killed their Messiah, because he came to humble their pride rather than pamper it with temporal power, had also mobbed his messenger, Paul, and endeavored to silence the Gospel he proclaimed; but instead of doing that, their wrath became a providential Euroclydon to hurry him to Rome, whither he had long desired to go, but vainly, for lack of funds. The very morning after God promised he should go to Rome, the Jews vowed he should die before breakfast at Jerusalem (Acts 23: 11, 12). Their persecution hurried him to Rome instead, without expense to him, as a Roman prisoner, and gave him opportunity to influence not only more candid Jews, but also Romans who swayed the world. There were "Saints in Cæsar's household" ere long, and probably the sooner for Paul's chains, a Cæsar himself displaced the eagle by the cross, and adopted the motto, "In this sign conquer." Let us by personations recall the parallel providences in Bible times and since.

Providential Prisons

When I was a man of thirty I was unjustly cast into prison, having refused a woman's request to do the sin which she charged against me. I had previously been sold most wickedly into slavery by my own brothers, and this deeper degradation of imprisonment was hard to bear. But as in slavery, so in prison, I performed all duties required of me faithfully, and peacefully trusted God to keep the promise he had made to me in youth that I should be greatly useful. When two of my fellow prisoners had strange dreams, God helped me to interpret them. One of these, in fulfilment of my interpretation of his dream, became an officer of the king. He had promised to secure my release, but forgot me until the king needed an interpreter for a dream. Again God helped me, and I was taken from prison to be premier, I then saw that slavery and imprisonment were but providential steps to the throne. Through suffering I had come to a place where I could have the joy of preventing great suffering in a famine for which I gathered supplies of grain. I thanked God who had so wonderfully made all things work together for good, that using the very wrath and envy of my jealous brothers to get me free passage to the world's capital where I could be and say and do much greater things than when a petted child in my country home. Who am I? (Gen. 37 ff.).

I lived when wicked customs had come into the Church of God. Priests would sell indulgences to all kinds of sin for money. Forms of worship were counted more important than right living. I cried out against these wrongs, for which the priests sought to kill me. To save my life my friends arrested me and hid me in a comfortable prison, where my enemies would not think to look for me. Besides, I was dressed like a knight and called "the Knight George." As it was not safe for me to preach at that time I translated the Bible into the language of my people, and the very day it was finished the situation changed and I was able to go forth and preach again. But the Bible translation, which I could not have made if the enemies of God's Word had not silenced my voice, was the best work I ever did. Who am I? (Luther).

I was a swearing tinker who hated God and good men, but in God's mercy I was led to love the Christ I had so often cursed and to preach the pure gospel, condemning selfish and wicked customs in rulers of Church and State. And so I was put in prison, where I wrote a book that did more for the cause they oppose than the voice they had silenced ever could have done. Who am I? (Bunyan).

What a golden chain of stories could be told of the efforts to destroy the Bible itself as well as silence the men who have faithfully proclaimed its gospel, the good news of social justice, which ever rouses the hatred of the unjust!

Curiously enough the Bible in chains signified at one time the Bible set free. Chained Bibles were put on six reading desks of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, in 1540, in order that the people might freely read them, as they had not previously been allowed to do. Bibles were too big and costly for the people to own them, and because they were costly and might be stolen for their commercial value, and still more lest those who did not wish the people to read the Bible lest corrupt practices in the Church might be exposed might take the Bibles and hide them away, they were chained to the reading desks, where, all day, the people would gather to hear one and another read the glad tidings that had previously been kept back by the priests.

Just thirteen years previous to that there had been a burning of Bibles in the churchyard of the same cathedral by order of Cardinal Woolsey. Chained Bibles were certainly better than burned Bibles, particularly as the Bible was chained in the interest of liberty, liberty of the people to read it, while the burning of the Bible had been a denial of their right to read it. One old writer tells us: "It was wonderful to see with what joy this Book of God was received, not only among the learned sort . . . but generally all England over, among all the vulgar and common people, and with what eagerness God's Word was heard, and what resort to places where the reading of it was. And even little boys flocked among the rest to hear portions of the holy scripture read."

THE TRADITIONAL PRISON OF PAUL IN ROME

Now let us come back to Paul's preaching at Rome. His theme there as everywhere, was, Jesus the Saviour and King.

An African missionary tells the following interesting story:

When I went to Africa there was no written language, so I was forced to learn here a little and there a little, from the conversation of the natives. One word I listened for and never heard. Two years-and-a-half went by, and it seemed as if I never would make the people understand until I found that word. One night I heard some of the men telling stories of adventures. One related how his master had rescued him from a lion. I listened eagerly, hoping to catch the word—the long-sought word. The incident was finished, th word was not spoken; my hope was crushe my heart was sick. Afterwards I spoke to th man and asked him; "What did you call yo master when he saved you from the lion?" A once he gave me the longed-for word—th word which means Saviour; and I was abl for the first time to make clear to him wha the Saviour would be to him. With joy o his face he caught the message, as he ex claimed, Is that what you have been trying t tell us all this time?

When one bears a message of rescue, if th peril be of physical death, what hardships h is willing to bear, what dangers to meet!

The first successful messenger to ge through from Peking to Tientsin, during th siege of the Legations at the former city, wa a lad, who was not a baptized Christian, bu whose custom it had been to attend the mis sion services regularly. When the trouble commenced, his employers dismissed him objecting to have any one connected wit foreigners on their premises. After days o terror, when numbers of the native Christian were massacred, some of the missionaries went out upon the streets, seeking among th ruins for any of their people who might pos sibly have escaped, and be in hiding. N one was found except this lad of fifteen, wh followed them, and begged to be taken int the mission compound. A month later, when the Legations and all the Europeans of Pekin were anxiously seeking for a messenger t carry to Tientsin news of their terrible straits this lad asked to be allowed to make th attempt. The marines, who occupied a posi tion on a small portion of the wall, let th boy down by a rope, after dark, into th southern city. He slept close to the gat that night, and at dawn mingled with th excited crowds without the city, and started on his perilous journey. After some day and many adventures, he reached Tientsin i safety, and delivered his message. He receive a letter in reply, which he was again success ful in getting through. The importance of th lad's brave deed may be better estimate when it is remembered that, before his mes sage was delivered, the commanders of the allied troops, fearing from the long silence that all was over with the foreigners i Peking, had determined to delay their march upon the capital. The arrival of this import ant young mes senger change their plans and enable them to rescue the Legations at a time when it seemed almost impossible for them to hold out much longer.

A CHAINED BIBLE
In an English Church

Every preacher, every teacher, should realize that he, too, bears a message of life and death, not of the body but of the soul, and should be as self-sacrificing and as brave and as persistent in delivering it. He is to raise "the siege of man-soul," beset with perils, from which Christ alone can bring deliverance.

JEWS FLEE FROM PERSECUTION IN RUSSIA

DETAILS of the extraordinary outbreak against the Jews, at Kishineff, in the Russian province of Bessarabia, which have been received during the week, show that the original reports of the affair were not exaggerated. To mark its disapproval of the riots, the imperial government has summarily removed Gen. Von Raaben, Governor of Kishineff, and Chief of Police, Ivan Chamchinsky, who so signally failed to preserve order, and to protect the Jewish residents of Kishineff from the wrath of the infuriated mob. Reliable dispatches state that a number of suits for damages have been instituted against Governor Von Raaben by Jewish sufferers. Under the Russian law, a public official is personally responsible for the results of his administration.

Some of the details of the recent disturbances would seem to show conclusively that the riots were premeditated. The anti-Semitic newspaper Bessarabitz, is accused of instigating the rising. Policemen hinted broadly to the Jews of Kishineff, that "at Eastertime all Jews will be slaughtered." As already stated in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, the trouble began on Easter Sunday, but did not reach its height until the next day, when half the town was looted by the mobs. A letter says:

"They treated the Jews like dogs. They proceeded to the principal street, where they broke into stores and destroyed property. Feathers from looted beds covered the pavements like snow. What Jews they met in the streets they struck down like dogs, with clubs. All Jews that could, fled to cellars for safety. Murdered people lay in the streets like flies and the mob trampled over their bodies. Finally a telegram was sent from a neighboring town to St. Petersburg and the order came to stop.

A woman in Kishineff writes:

"They snatched my one-year old child from my arms. One took it by the leg, another by the other and tore it in twain. I begged them to kill me. They caught up my boy, eight years old, and chopped him to pieces.

Abraham Wolornick, a refugee from Kishineff, who has come to New York, makes this statement:

"I was in my house on Easter Sunday morning about the time the Gentiles were coming from their churches. I heard a great noise, which grew when the Gentiles rushed into the street where I lived, and I heard shouts of 'Let us kill them!' Then I looked out, saw the crowd throwing stones through the windows and attacking all the Jews they found. I was afraid to go out. I saw men, women and children with their hands and ears and noses cut off, and bodies that had been dismembered lay in the street. The Gentiles ripped open beds seeking money, and the feathers filled the streets like snow. I saw one

OUR FIRST SWEDISH R.R. STATION

POPULAR RECOGNITION IN FINLAND

By DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH

IV. Greetings at Uleaborg

THAT night in Uleaborg was a restful night. For the first time in two weeks we slept in real beds. Throughout the country districts of Finland they use what I designate as telescope beds. These beds resemble an extension dining-table. When not in use the bed-clothes are doubled up, and the bed itself is telescoped to one-third its natural size. As the Finns are rather short of stature, the beds when extended to full length are undersized, and although I personally measure only five feet six inches, I invariably found the beds just six inches too short for convenient accommodation. The head-board is always towards the centre of the room so that the feet are towards the wall—just why I have never been able to discover—and while the bedding was always abundant, I never could sleep for more than half an hour in any given position. Hence I welcomed more heartily than my readers may believe, a bed in which I could stretch again to my full length.

A Clerical Deputation

The morning after we arrived in Uleaborg, a lovely city of about 17,000 inhabitants, we were as usual besieged by a small army of mendicants, who piteously pleaded, with tears in their eyes, for help. Even the inner stairs of the hotel accommodated a detachment, while around the outer steps could be found a great variety of the poverty-stricken, in every conceivable attitude of humble suppliancy. To some, cash relief was given, while others were referred to the exceptionally efficient Provincial Relief Committee there resident. Before leaving the hotel we were waited on by the Lutheran clergy of the city, including Bishop Forsman, of the Diocese of Kuopio, who came to pay their respects, and to assure us that America had afforded a "never to be forgotten assistance to a patient, long-suffering and honest people, who will ever hold in grateful remembrance the practical manifestation of true Christian love of which they had been the appreciative recipients, when almost overwhelmed with affliction, which they had tried hard to bear without complaint and without publicity."

SWEDISH FRONTIER GATE

Immediately after the retirement of the clerical deputation, a little class of deaf mutes, headed by their teacher, inquired for "the American Dr. Klopsch." I asked them to be shown into a private room and at once called to see them. There were ten deaf mutes, all under twelve, each bearing a tiny bouquet. The teacher—I regret that I do not remember his name, but God knows it—addressed me in German, and told me how even the little ones who could not hear, and could speak only with difficulty, had read of the kind-hearted people in a distant land who had come to the rescue of a comparatively unknown people, and helped to save their lives, and relieve their desperate sufferings, and that these little ones had expressed a great desire to say "thank you" to the one who had come over to see for himself how great the need and how best to help. Then each one of the deaf mutes in turn walked up, and mechanically uttering a few words of grateful acknowledgment, handed me a bouquet.

Deeply touched, I endeavored to reply, but the recollection of my own little deaf mute son, 5,000 miles away, made at first, I am afraid, my utterances quite unintelligible. However, collecting myself at last, I congratulated the teacher in charge, told him of my own boy, and that I would write him concerning this touching demonstration, and send him one of the bouquets, and then invoked God's blessing upon him and upon his charges.

At noon there was a great gathering in the public square in front of the hotel. Word was sent me that I should hold myself in readiness for a tremendous public demonstration. As I had only one brown homespun suit—the one in which I had traveled from Helsingfors to Uleaborg—there was no opportunity to dress for the occasion, and consequently I was ready when the call came, a few minutes after the warning. I walked down the stairs, lined with poor people, and out on the porch. Here the Mayor of the city welcomed me. Before us were two thousand school children, who had been marshaled into position to sing to the American visitors, the first ever known to have traversed Finland during the winter season, and who had come as friends on an errand of mercy, at a time when traveling in that country required some greater incentive than the mere quest for pleasure and recreation.

Five Thousand Voices In Song

In addition to the children, about 3,000 adults had assembled, so that there were fully 5,000 people confronting us. A precentor led the children, and they sang as though it came direct from the hearts. Then the Mayor addressed us in English, and I replied in the same language, which Dr. Reuter kindly interpreted to the audience. The utmost enthusiasm prevailed. Cheer after cheer went up, and America and the Americans were applauded vociferously. Then a few flowers were presented by little girls, each of whom made a brief address, which we, of course, could not understand, but the meaning of which we recognized from the eyes of the tiny orators.

DR. KONR. RELANDER

A Notable Event

The same evening there was to be a farewell banquet to the retiring Governor, who, owing to his friendliness to his own countrymen, and his unwillingness to enforce the tyrannical measures of Governor Bobrikoff—what a pity that I must desecrate this page by the publication of his name—had incurred the disfavor of the Russian Government. The Mayor and his friends invited me to be present. I declined again and again. I pleaded the lack of suitabie clothes, but to no avail. The clothes I wore, they contended, were a badge of honor. Still I hesitated. I feared that my attendance might give a political coloring to my mission, and there was yet much to be done. But they were so urgent, and Dr. Reuter joined them so eloquently, that at last, although very reluctantly, I consented. The banquet commenced at five o'clock in the evening.

As I entered, the band struck up Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever." Looking up I saw the American and Finland flags intertwined, and under the American flag were the words: "America, the only home of true liberty." Two hundred and fifty people, mostly in evening dress, were present. Our party were (after an introduction to their excellencies), escorted to a seat near the Governor and his wife.

Hour after hour was taken up with speeches. At last, passing from eulogistic remarks concerning the retiring Governor and his beneficent reign, one of the speakers, addressing me in German, extolled the surpassing kindness of the good people of America to the Finns, and called for three hearty cheers for the American visitors. These given, I made a twenty-minute address, in German, rigidly avoiding politics. The Governor was carried in a chair on the shoulders of his admirers around the room, and, in the enthusiasm this measure awakened, it was proposed that I pass through a similar experience, but this I could not consent to, and my wishes were respected. This busy day over, on the morrow the Uleaborg Relief Committee, headed by Dr. Relander, called, and reported on the condition of affairs in the province.

Dr. Relander is a great enthusiast, and as such he proved invaluable to the work in hand. Enthusiasm has more sentiment than conservatism, and conservatism never can rise to the occasion of a famine. The heart-strings must be stirred when human life and suffering are the subjects under consideration, and the moment they begin to vibrate, enthusiasm is begotten. Probably no man in all Finland understood the situation better than Dr. Relander, and surely no one could have been more sympathetic then he. But even enthusiastic Finns are conservative, and hence Dr. Relander brought with him statistics to bear out his every assertion, and his figures were reduced down to the minutest fraction of a per cent. The other members, seven in number, were very sedate and serious, and used but few words to convey to me how their hearts and the hearts of their people were touched by the generous contributions of the sympathizing and self-sacrificing Americans. They all agreed that without this help—nearly equal to that offered by the Finns themselves—the famine must have resulted in a fearful calamity—which, they asserted, God himself, by moving upon the hearts of the American people, had graciously stayed; and each one for himself and in behalf of the people he represented, begged me to convey to every contributor, great and small, the combined thanks of a suffering and downtrodden nation.

Dr. Relander's Plea

After this we entered upon the careful consideration of the facts presented, and truly they were sadder than any I have yet seen in print. But why enter into heartrending details and harrow the feelings of the reader? The province of Uleaborg contains 277,628 souls. Of these, over 90,000, or nearly 33 per cent., were in a truly deplorable condition. Dr. Relander, as provincial physician, had officially traveled up and down and across the province. In a single village named Kolari, over 3,000 were then on the verge of starvation. Children were sick, mothers could no longer nurse their babes, the cattle were killed, milk was rarely seen in more than one house out of ten, the death-rate had fearfully increased, hunger-typhus had again and again broken out, and herculanean efforts were constantly employed to stay the harvest of death on a frightful scale. The Committee had about reached its limit, and our arrival inspired them with new hope. Kolari, Saraisniemi and Kajani were within their boundaries, and earnestly did Dr. Relander plead in behalf of the tens of thousands of sufferers whose burden he self-sacrificingly placed on his own shoulders.

CHILDREN BID GOOD-BY

Cablegrams from New York had kept posted as to the progress of the Relief nd, and rarely did I experience greater easure than on this occasion, when I ddened the hearts of these serious men, good Dr. Relander, with an appro- ation amounting to 50,000 marks, or 0,000. God be thanked for the good this oney has done for the helpless, the hun- , the starving, the dying—men, women, children, who shall live to praise Him their deliverance in time of trouble.

In the afternoon of the same day we k the train to Kemi, the most northerly lway station in Finland, and from which dges were again employed to take us Tornea, at the northern point of the zen Gulf of Bothnia, thence to Hapa- nda, our first stopping point across the edish boundary, and from there to Mo- vi, the first railroad station in Sweden. We left the hotel at 1.30. Down the eets could be seen the multitude wend- g their way to the station. Thousands on thousands were there when we ar- ed. It was almost impossible to thread r way through. The approach to the tion, the station itself, the platform, re all densely crowded. I longed to le myself until the train arrived, but ere was no nook or corner not already ed. How many there were actually esent I dare not guess; but nothing uld be seen but a sea of faces—and ppy, thankful faces they were. While I od there almost helpless, one beautiful l of 18, with dark, wavy hair, florid, althy complexion and bright eyes, hand- me a bouquet, and told me in clear-cut glish, that she could not stand the ought of becoming Russianized, and soon e would surely come to America. I as- red her that she would be heartily wel- me, and find our shores the most hos-sponded, but not even a child moved from its place, and when we entered the sledges to be driven to the hotel, the crowd, while cheering lustily, never attempted to push its way toward us, and when finally we drove away, they were still standing in the place assigned them until the signal was given to disperse. But for these precautionary measures we might have found it difficult to carry out our arrangements for a hasty supper and immediate departure for a twenty-five mile journey to Haparanda, where the Swedish Governor of Lulea had made provision for our entertainment. On leaving the hotel we found the usual crowd gathered to see us off. Flowers were thrown in the sledges, and cheers rent the air, as we started on the long journey before us. At 11 o'clock we reached the bridge that divides Finland from Sweden, between Tornea and Haparanda. On the Swedish side the custom officers approached. Dr. Reuter simply said that we were "the Americans," and bag and baggage, without examination, we were admitted into King Oscar's country. At the hotel we were received by Capt. Sundbaum and Rev. Juliebo, who were deputed by the Swedish Government to welcome us. After a midnight dinner plans were made for the coming day, and at 2 A.M. we retired, weary and exhausted, and slept for the first time in our lives in Sweden. Before retiring, we found on our centre table a beautiful bouquet, with silk ribbons in the American and the Finnish national colors, with a card, telling us that the people of Finland were remembering us while we were sleeping in Sweden.

PASTOR JULIEBO DR. KLOPSCH CAPT. SUNDBAUM

I had promised that before starting on my tour to Lulea and Stockholm, I would recross the bridge, and attend a reception at Tornea. So the next day, bright and early, escorted by Prof. Reuter, Mr. Alopaeus, Captain Sundbaum and Rev. Juliebo, we left Haparanda, and again entered Finland at Tornea. We were directed to the Municipal Building, which was crowded to the doors. The public schools had been granted a holiday, in order that all the children might help to honor the American visitors, and they were there in great numbers. On entering the building we were escorted to a place in the assembly room, and there we stood, without a chair, facing the standing audience for over a quarter of an hour before the programme commenced. It was an awkward pause, and personally very embarrassing. At last the dignitaries appeared. Two or three songs were sung by the people, and then the Mayor made a very impressive address, in the course of which he paid the highest compliment to American philanthropy. Then came another song, followed by my reply, again interpreted by Prof. Reuter, who deserves great praise for his readiness and kind willingness to interpret my utterances, some of which, particularly my hearty invitations to the good people of Finland to come over and abide with us, were, as I afterwards learned, not at all to his liking. Then the superintendent of the schools made a long and very impassioned address, extolling Finland and the Finns, their civilization, their simplicity of life, their virtues, their institutions of learning, etc., and during his remarks the tears literally rolled down his cheeks. He felt for his country and for his people, and the very thought of their physical and political sufferings moved his heart, and gave him a liberty of utterance that touched the hearts of his auditors, and melted them likewise to tears. At the close of his address, he presented me with two volumes of the Kalevala. In reply, I told him how near the sufferings of his people had brought them to the hearts of our own, and that since the first reports of famine the Americans had studied up carefully all about Finland, and had learned of their piety, their noble character, their educational institutions, their high respect for womanhood, their art and their literature, and that many years ago, Dr. Crawford, the translator of the Kalevala, then Consul-General in St. Petersburg, had presented both Dr. Talmage and myself with an autograph copy of the celebrated work, which, since then, I have read with genuine pleasure and profit, and ever increasing admiration. Then after the Finnish national song, followed a handshaking of amazing proportions, of which the children got the major share.

table in all the world. Then Mrs. Blunt, e charming Finnish wife of the British ice-Consul, stepped up, and thanking me r what the Americans had done for her ffering people, wished me a pleasant urney home, expressing the hope that I ight find all my dear ones in good health waiting me. At this moment the train rrived. As we descended the steps from e station the multitude began to sing, nd when they had finished, we listened to n original poem extolling the land of Co- mbus, whose beneficence had encircled he globe. Then amid deafening cheers, he waving of handkerchiefs and the good- yes from a thousand throats, the train rew out, and we were on our way to Kemi, five hours distant.

Dr. Relander had come to journey with s, and from Kemi to make an official edge tour of Northern Finland and Lap- nd. He was full to overflowing with he subject nearest our hearts, and a most nteresting companion. We were inter- pted at every station by multitudes, who ad come to welcome and thank us in ong. The majority of them must have raveled many miles, for usually the vil- ages are greatly scattered, and conse- uently sparsely populated. Invariably appeared on the platform and addressed hem. At Kemi, 1,200 had gathered. The inds were icy; but for a full hour I stood areheaded at the station door, with a hilling draft back of me. Never had I een greater discipline in the handling of crowd. Song after song, and speech fter speech was delivered. Twice I re-

OUR PARTY LEAVING TORNEA

Mr. Alopaeus, on behalf of Finland, formally delivered us safe and sound in the presence of the great audience to Capt. Sundbaum and Rev. Juliebo, the representatives of Sweden. The people then sang, and one of their number addressed us. To their farewell address I replied:

"Permit me to express to you and all the good people of Finland my heartfelt thanks for your generous hospitality to me while in your lovely land. Words cannot express how greatly I appreciate your simple life, which I have had exceptional opportunities to observe, and which has been to me an object lesson that I shall ever remember. Your earnestness, sincerity and simplicity have greatly impressed me, and I leave you with unfeigned regret. Your custom of expressing your affection in song and flowers is indeed very touching, and has been to me a genuine inspiration. May God abundantly bless Finland and speedily drive from it the dark spectre of famine that now enshrouds it. God bless America for what it has done to bring to you and to your homes, hope, comfort and sunshine."

Then followed the familiar cheer, "Ja koos Long Ave Tohtori Klopsch," and while it was given we stepped across the line into Sweden. Two girls followed us all the way until we reached our host in Haparanda. They and the happy memories of our arduous yet very pleasant trip were all that we could carry with us. And now once again. God bless Finland and its people, and may he ever preserve for them their piety, their purity and their physical and political prosperity.

The Banner Over the Work

A DAY or two ago we passed a square on one of the New York streets where a number of old houses had been demolished and removed, and preparations were being made for the erection of an enormous building on the site. Down fifteen or twenty feet below the street level, men were at work, carting away dirt and hauling blocks of granite into the empty space. They were very common looking men—rough, unskilled day-laborers. But there was a lofty flagpole standing in the midst of the great lot, and a flag floating at the top of it bore the names of the firm of rich merchants by whose order a vast structure is to stand on that spot. What could it matter to those men at their humble toil, whether they dug away the rubbish for the foundation, or laid the copestone of the finished structure? The same banner would float over all the workmen, all the way up; the banner that meant authority for building and a reward for faithful labor.

Oh, if we could see now with the eyes we shall have by and by, the places we call lowly, and the work we think hardly worth while, it would stand out before us in amazing grandeur as contributing to superstructions of eternal glory. A hundred years from now, it will not be known who were the wagoners, or who was the architect of the most splendid structure in New York.

And what difference do you suppose the angels see between the work of Wesley, Spurgeon or Moody, and the work of that little child over there—when they look at the whole mighty kingdom which has been building for thousands of years—except only the difference in faithfulness? And that difference may be in favor of the child.

One banner floats over all the workmen, and it means no more for the greatest than for the least.

Church Affiliation

VERY gratifying to Christian people throughout the land, is the initial step now taken by three denominations for affiliation and co-operation in church work. At a conference recently held at Pittsburg, Pa., plans were formulated for union in action, of the Congregationalists, United Brethren and Methodist Protestants. The conference was necessarily tentative, and the results will need to be ratified by each body, but the spirit manifested was so cordial, and the difficulties in the way so small, that the highest hopes of success are entertained. It is worthy of notice that there were no doctrinal differences to adjust. All the three churches are practically in accord on the tenets. The points of difference are in church government. The Congregationalists have no central authority, every church being a kind of religious republic, managing its own affairs; while the other two denominations are controlled by quadrennial General Conferences. Even this difference, however, is not so radical as it appears; for although the Congregational Union cannot legislate for the churches, its recommendations have great weight and are held in high respect. With so close an approach to union, the possibility of friendly co-operation was obvious, and a sub-committee of five representatives of each denomination was appointed to discuss details of a plan to be submitted to the general committee. That organic union of the churches will be achieved, is probably too much to expect, but a great advantage will be gained, if in such matters as home and foreign missions, the three churches can act as one, and can unite in other departments of Christian work.

It will be a glorious day for the Christian churches of our country, if the example thus set is extensively followed. There are too many denominations, and there are groups which might easily be formed which would reduce the number. Affiliation, should union be found impossible, would effect a great saving of expense, and tend to eliminate the spirit of rivalry which now retards the extension of Christ's kingdom.

Pluck It Up at Once

IT may be doubted if any man ever plucked up a strongly rooted fault or sin unless he did it suddenly, and out and out by one supreme effort.

You have a tooth that's got to come out. Well the dentist cannot draw it gradually, a little to-day and a little to-morrow, and a little more the next day. There must be a strong, firm, quick pull and wrench—and done with it.

When the serpent came out of the heat and fastened on Paul's hand that evening after the shipwreck on the island of Malta, suppose he had said, "Now this thing must be attended to gradually; I must get rid of this evil by degrees; it will not do to hurry too much." You can't take a serpent off a man's arm at the rate of a coil a day; it must be shaken into the fire as quickly as possible, with one vigorous, desperate motion at once.

If anything is wrong in your Christian life, anything by way of neglect, anything by way of positive transgression, deal with it sharply and suddenly. Gradual treatment is folly, and delay only gives it more power to hurt and destroy.

The Persecuted People

ONE of our subscribers, who has been reading the story of the recent terrible massacre of the Jews at Kishineff, writes as follows:

ARDSLEY, N. Y.

How beautifully is the Holy Scripture fulfilled. The slaughter of the Jews in Russia serves to remind us of the warning words of the Blessed Redeemer of mankind. Jesus said, "Do not think that I came to send peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but the sword." (Matt. 10:34.) "I am come to cast fire on the earth. . . . Think ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, No." (Luke 44:49 and 51, Douay version). Henceforth let no one have the effrontery to blasphemously deny the divinity of Christ, since his prophecies have so unerringly come to pass.

S. W.

Probably many Jews have recalled the words with sorrow during the past weeks. Very few years have passed since they were uttered, without the Jew being persecuted in some land. The chosen people have been regarded as a legitimate prey and have been oppressed and hated in all countries whither they have gone. Tenderly as Jesus loved them, he foresaw how bitter were the sufferings that their rejection of him would entail upon them. Men calling themselves by his name, but having none of his spirit, would make the Christian religion a cloak for gratifying social spite. The fact, profoundly as we deplore it, is full of significance. God's warnings do not fall to the ground, but are fulfilled in all their stern terms. The Jews were warned that in their dispersion they should find no ease among the nations, and that they should have no security in their lives, but "should fear day and night." It has been even so. The people who inflict the punishment, thus unconsciously fulfilling the prophecy, are none the less wicked in doing it. The righteous judgment of God will avenge the cruelties perpetrated on his people. But the important consideration for all people is the fact that we are now witnessing, in a period of doubt and scepticism, a visible fulfilment of God's Word. It is a lesson to which we should do well to take heed, lest we also, nationally or individually, incur any of the penalties threatened therein. May the time soon come when we shall witness, too, the fulfilment of those other prophecies which are just as sure, of Israel's repentance and restoration to God's favor! He who cast them off and dispersed them shall surely gather them and make them, as he promised, a joy to the whole earth.

Russia and the Famine

NEARLY two months ago, cable dispatches from St. Petersburg appeared in the leading American newspapers, announcing that the Russian Government had made large appropriations for famine relief in Finland. It was stated, with much detail, that a vast scheme of public works was projected, including railroad building, construction of public highways, drainage, etc., and that this plan, soon to be in full operation, would give employment to every able-bodied man in Finland, and thus relieve the prevalent distress. This cheering news, we duly presented to our readers, as a simple act of justice to Russia, and an acknowledgment of her practical solicitude for the suffering Finns.

That the cable dispatches referred to were by no means accurate, however, is now made apparent in a letter from Professor J. N. Reuter, of Helsingfors, who accompanied the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on his relief tour. Dr. Reuter's letter says:

Now the real fact is that not one cent has been allotted to Finland out of Russian public money. That Russians have contributed privately is quite true, and the money has been gratefully received.

I have made up a full list of all relief work carried on by the Government (that is, the Finnish Government, and Finnish public money), and venture to send you on a separate sheet an account hereof. As you will see, these statements do not include the amount of grain given out as loans, in order to provide farmers with seed for the spring.

There have appeared in the American newspapers, accounts about the famine, wherein I am cited as an authority. I have read two cuttings, and am sorry to say that they are not quite accurate. One of the notices I saw was fairly correct, but another, which was much shorter, conveyed a highly erroneous impression. People from America have written to the Committee, and also to Dr. Relander, who has written in a Finnish newspaper. I have replied, but my reply has not yet been published.

The communication in the American newspaper to which I refer, is founded on my report before the American Ambassador. I told him that we, in all places, found bread and flour, but that this was entirely due to the successful work of the Relief Committee. If help had not come in time, there would have been great misery and, no doubt, deaths from starvation, which has not happened now. I also told him that things would probably be much worse later in the spring, since many peasants, who had supply to last them over the winter, would find their stores exhausted.

I return to the statement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the relief appropriations. The assistance did not come from Russian, but from Finnish public money, and in each case on the instigation of Finnish authorities. The railways were decreed upon already in 1900 (Idensalmi-Kajana line) or 1897 (Uleaborg-Tornea line), and that of course the railway loan of ten million marks ($2,000,000) out of which the various appropriations, present and future, shall be paid, cannot be added to the appropriations.

Part of the railway appropriation was granted on account of the famine, in so far as a larger sum than was originally intended was assigned for the construction of the Idensalmi-Kajana railway.

This was done on the recommendation of the Finnish Senate, and of course the extra money comes from the Finnish exchequer.

We gladly give space to these extracts from Professor Reuter's letter, in justice to the Finnish Senators, and for the purpose of correcting the misinformation so widely disseminated through the inaccurate press cablegrams. In reproducing them, we believed at the time that they contained a reliable statement of facts, and doubtless other journals held the same opinion. It is well that the matter should be set right, even at this late date.

Mysteries

AMONG the mysteries which baffle us in modern life, when electricity, photography and steam combine to make life extremely public, none is greater than the fact that people suddenly disappear. They drop out of sight in an instant, as if the earth had opened. Sometimes the river or the sea give up their lifeless forms, sometimes they are heard of wandering away in a strange land, sometimes they are never heard of or seen again. The mysteries that are never explained, the tangles that are never unraveled, even in the face of clever police ingenuity, of patient detective scrutiny, of newspaper exploitation, and of fabulous rewards freely offered, furnish plots for exciting novels, and wound hearts with deepest anguish. To-day, it is a man in his prime. To-morrow, it is a maiden in her bloom. Next day, a venerable matron nearing her seventieth year. What does it mean?

The pessimist would say that civilization is only a thin veneer, and that the elemental and primitive forces of the race are too strong for conventional fetters. The sociologist would point to the fact that conditions are unequal, and desperate characters are about, driven to madness by the woeful contrasts of the time. The Christian bows his head to the will of God, knowing that no bolt speeds except from a Divine hand, and no blunders are possible in God's great plan.

But here is one practical lesson from an old song:

> Be kind to each other, the night's coming on,
> When friend and when brother perchance will be gone;
> Then, 'mid your dejection, how sweet to have earned,
> The blest recollection of kindness returned.

A Great Midsummer Campaign

A SUCCESSFUL newspaper always seeks to interest new people. The larger the circulation the richer, as a rule, the contents. If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had only 100,000 subscribers it could not afford to provide such interesting, attractive, edifying and instructive features as it does with its tremendous weekly output of nearly a quarter of a million copies. Every subscriber profits by the addition of another subscriber, and when these come at the rate of twenty thousand new subscribers yearly, the improvement assumes remarkable proportions. Such has been the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past ten years, and hence the wonderful changes for the better that have characterized it from year to year.

We know that we are making a good paper and we are glad of it. Started for the sole purpose of disseminating spiritual truth, it has been true and loyal to its mission, and tens of thousands have been led by its means into the clearer, fuller light that now irradiates their lives and makes the world through them brighter, better and happier. And what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done for these tens of thousands it can and will and must do for other hundreds of thousands, perhaps even, and may God grant that it be so, for millions.

It is with this in view that we have determined, at financial sacrifice to ourselves, and with the hearty co-operation of our present subscribers—of which we feel thoroughly assured—to make a great effort to largely increase our subscription list, and thus to circulate more widely than ever before among the Christian people of this country, the brightest and best Family paper in all the world, which we verily believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be.

Expecting Great Things

We confidently believe that all of our present subscribers are so thoroughly pleased with the paper that they would be glad to see our hopes fully realized. They know the blessed influence THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exerts; for they themselves have felt it. Week after week they have scanned its beautiful pages, have read its inspiring messages, have reveled in its literary and artistic wealth, have been deeply interested, edified and instructed, and, after having read it from beginning to end, have sent it to some distant friends that they also might share its perennial riches.

All Love It

Few papers published are read and re-read as is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and none affords greater pleasure and delight, or makes warmer or more lasting friends. It is an indisputable fact that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a larger percentage of renewals than any other paper, and that, from its very beginning, it has retained more permanent subscriptions than any other publication; and its subscription list is constantly increasing. But what has been done in the past is only an indication of what may be done in the future, provided we all work heartily together with a view to securing the object on which we have now set our hearts.

A Financial Sacrifice

To bring this about, we have determined to enlist the cordial co-operation of our friends, and ourselves to make such a financial sacrifice as will demonstrate our own sincerity in the matter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be produced at less than its regular subscription price, which is $1.50 per annum. But to interest those who cannot appreciate its beauties, simply because they do not see the paper, we have decided to accept, during the month of June, an unlimited number of Half-Yearly Trial Subscriptions at 50 cents each, subject to the additional advantages set forth in the annexed coupons. For with each subscription we send, free of all expense, a life-sized facsimile of the Declaration of Independence, printed on durable bond paper, together with Henry Mann's "Story of the Events that led up to the Declaration," and "A History of the American Flag, How and by Whom it was Designed, and When and How it was Adopted as the National Emblem." We could not make this sacrifice but for the experience of the past, that a very large percentage of our subscribers renew, and when they renew they are glad to pay the regular subscription price, because they are satisfied that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is well worth all we ask for it.

A Magnificent Record

This year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD completes the twenty-fifth year of its existence. Its history is grand beyond compare. It has collected and distributed nearly TWO AND A HALF MILLION DOLLARS IN CHARITY. The farmers of Finland, Sweden, Norway and Russia, the martyrs of Armenia, the orphans of India, the reconcentrados of Cuba, the famine sufferers in China, the rescued men of the Bowery, the unfortunate girls of the Bethesda Home, the thousands of Lapless waifs of the tenements, all rise up and call it blessed. God be thanked for the opportunities and the privileges which were ours in the past; and may He graciously continue to pour out His blessing upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its editress and proprietor and its readers, and make us one and all increasingly useful in His service.

But, in addition to these great monumental charities, there is the mission of blessedness and usefulness of the paper itself which results in light, cheer, hope and happiness in the home circle. And it is this which we now wish to extend. We are engaged in a great Home Missionary effort. You can help us. We know you will help us, and thus have part and parcel in all the good which, under divine blessing, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall accomplish in years to come.

We Look to Our Friends

Let us begin the work of doubling the present number of its subscribers. While this is a great undertaking, an unprecedented task, it is nevertheless an easy one, for it means just one new subscriber for each and every one now on our list. Surely every subscriber can do this, and we believe you will do Your share, while we will gladly do everything within our power to help you.

How to Do It

Our plan is as follows: On the following page you will find four coupons. Please tear them apart at the indicated lines, then distribute them among such of your Church and Sunday School friends as will be likely to subscribe. They will thank you for doing so. Explain to them, the beauties, the riches, the great attractiveness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and urge them to give it a trial. Tell them that each coupon saves One Dollar on the combined price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for half a year and the Declaration of Independence with Henry Mann's Great "Story of the Events that Led up to the Declaration" together with the "History of the American Flag," and you will be surprised how quickly they will avail themselves of the exceptional opportunity thus offered. If four coupons are not enough for your purpose, write us and we will send you as many more as you may require, absolutely free of all charge. Do not forget, however, that the coupons are good only until July 1, and must not be mailed after that date, and be sure to sign your own name and address to every coupon you send in, in the space reserved on the back for it.

Yours Truly,

Editress and Proprietor.

Every such subscription begins as soon as received, and expires with the last number of the present year. Be sure to sign your own name and address in the space on the bottom of reverse side of the coupons.

New Premiums and New Features

Just 127 Years Old

THE original Declaration of Independence will never again be exhibited. It is securely fastened between two plates of glass, hermetically sealed and safely stored, where neither light nor moisture can reach it. This precious document, the charter of our nation's liberties, is thus forever hidden from the sight of the people. Years ago, while it was yet in a perfect state of preservation and clearly legible, the Department of State at Washington gave permission to have it used as the original design for a lithographic reproduction. For that purpose it was dampened to soften the ink on its surface, in order to transfer with absolute and unfailing accuracy the face of the document to a stone, from which afterwards a very limited number of copies were made. Two of these copies are in the possession of the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have just been reproduced in full life-size, measuring 26 x 31 inches. The handwriting is in every respect just as plain and as clear as on the day when the original Declaration, newly engrossed, was for the first time exhibited in Independence Hall, to the heroic patriots who imperilled their lives and their fortunes, when subscribing their names to the precious document on that ever memorable Fourth of July, 1776.

Mr. Henry Mann, the author of the "Story of the Events that led up to the Declaration of Independence," in his introduction says:

Why it Faded

"The Declaration of Independence, the Magna Charta of the English-speaking race, that document of which Professor Tucker has rightly said, that it is 'consecrated in the affections of Americans, and praise may seem as superficial as censure may be unavailing,' has just been removed forever from the people's reverential gaze. It has suffered very seriously from the rough treatment to which it was exposed in the earlier years of the Republic, folding and rolling having creased and broken the parchment. The wet press copying operation to which it was subjected about 1820, for the purpose of producing a facsimile copy, removed a large portion of the ink; subsequent exposure to the action of light, for more than thirty years, while the instrument was placed on exhibition, has resulted in the fading of the ink, particularly of the signatures.

"It is gratifying, however, to learn that no evidence of mould, or other disintegrating agents, can be discovered upon the parchment by microscopic examination, or any evidence that disintegration is now in progress.

"The Declaration has never been on exhibition at any of the Great Fairs since the Centennial Exposition. It was returned to the Department of State in 1877, and since then has never been out of the Department Building. For more than a year past it has not been on exhibition even in the Department. For the last nine years the Declaration has been kept flat in a frame between two sheets of glass, in a drawer of a steel case, and seldom exposed to light and air, and hereafter, in accordance with a report of a Committee of the National Academy of Sciences, which was appointed to examine the document, it will be kept in the dark, and as dry as possible, and never placed on exhibition.

A Premium for Patriots

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, deems it fitting at this time to place within easy reach of its every reader a history of the instrument so revered by all of us, and a facsimile of the Declaration itself, as engrossed by order of the Congress, and the signatures of the men who pledged 'their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor' that America should be free. In the 'Story of the events that led up to the Declaration,' which I have just prepared, Pictures of the signers are given, also of Independence Hall, where the Declaration was debated and adopted, and of other scenes and objects connected with that first and ever-memorable Fourth of July. The story of the facsimile should be read and studied and sacredly preserved in every American home."

Heroes Immortal

"The signers of the Declaration of Independence have long been numbered with the honored dead of the Republic. Their peerless monument is the Nation which they helped to create: their epitaph is the history of our Nation's progress from that Fourth of July in 1776 to its present leading place among the powers of the world. It is hard, from the secure standpoint of to-day, to fitly appreciate the sacrifices and the courage of that little band of Americans, who, from Independence Hall, sent forth their defiance, in the name of eternal right, to the armies and fleets of King George; but our best tribute to their memory is to follow their example of pure patriotism and unselfish devotion to duty, whatsoever our position in life."

Who would miss this opportunity, at a cost of but a little effort, of securing before the Fourth of July, now soon at hand, The Declaration of Independence, life size, and Henry Mann's Story—together with the History of the American Flag? We send it free, all charges prepaid, on receipt of only two coupon subscriptions. Five Dollars is the price usually asked for this Facsimile.

I have just received by your kindness the Red Letter New Testament. I have looked it over carefully and, without any hesitation, I believe it is the best thing of the kind ever published. I shall certainly use it in my work, and have already called the attention of my friends to it.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Mont Pelee Still Active

RECENT visitors to the West Indies report that the volcano is still sending forth ashes and steam with undiminished vigor. It is now a full year since the first terrible eruption which destroyed the town. During all that time the eruption has continued with varying intensity. It is estimated that not less than twenty-five million tons of ashes have fallen and there are no signs of the cessation of the output. A singular phenomenon was observed by a party of tourists who visited the island during the winter. They noticed that a cone had projected from the crater of Mont Pelee which gradually assumed the shape of a gigantic pillar. It was not composed of ashes but of large boulders of rock, which, falling upon the mud ejected from the volcano, were imbedded and held their places. From week to week the height of the shaft increased. Its base was in the interior of the crater, and as it was impossible to approach it, no idea could be formed of its size or composition. During the visit of the mail steamer, Esk, a number of the crew and passengers went ashore to get a nearer view of the pillar. While they were watching it, the whole mountain seemed to shudder, and an eruption of exceeding violence took place. The spectators ran for their lives, and on reaching the beach, hurried on board the boats, which were rowed with all speed for the steamer. Once safely on board, glasses were directed toward the crater. It was then seen, during a momentary clearing of the volcanic smoke, that the towering shaft had dropped bodily into the interior of the mountain, tearing away the sides of the crater, which is now twenty-four hundred feet in diameter. The scene is described as one of weird desolation, growing more appalling from day to day, as the mountain, like a living creature in agony, is convulsed with mighty throes, and from its yawning crater sends up the molten and pulverized rocks. It is such a scene as the Hebrew prophet saw in vision as accompanying the judgment of God on the earth:

> The mountains shall be molten under him, and the valleys shall be cleft as wax before the fire, and as the waters that are poured down a steep place (Micah 1:4).

Towed by His Prey

Two boys, playing on the banks of the canal in Jersey City, N. J., one day last week, had an experience that gave them a fright. They found a large turtle asleep in the sun. One of them took hold of it, calling to his companion to help him secure the prize. The turtle shot out its head and made a vicious snap at its captor. The boy was startled, and in trying to avoid the bite lost his footing. The turtle instantly made for the water, but the boy caught it as it passed him and held on with all his might. As he had fallen he was unable to prevent the turtle reaching the water and was dragged in. Fearful of being drowned if he let go, he clung to the turtle and was being towed by it down the canal when his cries reached the ears of his companion, who, happily for him, was able to swim. He soon reached his side and held him up. The determined boy still held the turtle, and the two together at last succeeded in dragging it to the bank. He ought to be thankful that he did not lose his life. There are some in mature life who have been similarly persistent in their determination to secure the world's prizes and have still clung to them even when their very souls were at stake.

> He went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions (Matt. 19:22).

A Somnambulist's Peril

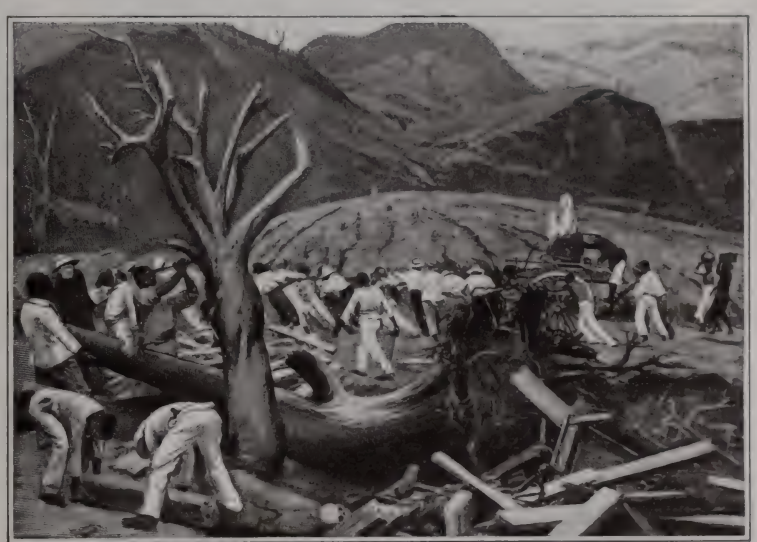
A policeman on duty in Brooklyn, N. Y., rescued a woman from a perilous position a few days ago. Just as day was dawning, he noticed a large white object on the projecting ledge of a house on a respectable street. As he came nearer he saw that it was a woman, clad only in her night robe. He noticed that her eyes were closed, and she was evidently asleep. He procured a ladder from an unfinished house nearby, and, climbing up, took hold of the woman. She awaked instantly and screamed in terror. She would have fallen, but the policeman held her firmly, and lifted her safely through the window into her room. She had no idea how she came into so perilous a position, but admitted that several times before she had walked in her sleep. She did not need to be warned of her peril when she was awakened. It was sufficiently obvious to her then. It is so with those who are in spiritual peril. Their first need is for the awakening which reveals their danger to them.

> Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light (Eph. 5:14).

An Unintended Victim

The detectives of Cincinnati are investigating an attempted crime, which has caused the accidental death of one of the employees of an Express Company. Five of the employees were transferring packages in the company's barns, when one of them noticed that a package was leaking. The cover of it easily came off and revealed a bottle of whiskey. It had fallen or been struck at some place on the route and the bottle was cracked. One of the men ran for a tin can in which some of the liquor was caught. He took a drink and then passed the can to the others. Each of the men drank a little. In a few moments the man who had taken the first and largest drink was taken violently ill and the others were in severe pain. An ambulance was summoned in which all were sent to the nearest hospital. An antidote was administered which relieved four of the men, but the first seized died in a short time. Analysis of the contents of the bottle showed that a deadly poison had been mixed with the whiskey, presumably by some enemy of the consignee. What a pity that the men were not total abstainers! Then the deadly stuff would have run harmlessly away. Of course, they would not have tasted it, in any case, had they known that there was poison in it; but even if it had not been doctored, the wise king's warning applied to it.

> At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder (Pro. 23:32).



SEARCHING THE RUINS OF ST. PIERRE

Gold from Sand

Descriptions of a new device, invented by Thomas A. Edison, to extract gold from sand, have been furnished to the press. There are large tracts of sand in various parts of the Southwest which are known to contain gold. Hitherto they have not been worked, because the water required for the operation of the hydraulic system, which is the only method known that can extract the metal, has not been accessible. Mr. Edison has now perfected a system by which the gold is separated by an air blast. The sand is passed over screens which divide it automatically into particles of a uniform size. They are then passed through rollers which reduce the particles to dust. This falls through a slit, each of which is the air blast, that is so regulated as to send the sand into one compartment, while the heavier particles of gold fall into another. The machines has been tried in New Mexico and it separated ninety-eight per cent. of the gold, while the hydraulic system does not collect more than seventy-five per cent. It is expected that the new invention will render productive lands said hitherto considered worthless. The process is based on the fact, that sand containing gold is heavier than without it, and therefore can be separated by a carefully adjusted gust of wind. It is a type of the separation that will eventually take place among men, when they who have in them the gold of character are gathered into God's kingdom, while those destitute of it are driven out.

> The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away (Ps. 1:4).

Human Light

At a recent meeting of the American Philosophical Society, Prof. Arthur W. Goodspeed, of the University of Pennsylvania, announced a remarkable discovery. It was, that the human body gives out a light so strong that photographs may be taken by it. He exhibited a number of such photographs, which had been taken by the light from his own hand. In the experiments he used one of the Crookes's tubes, by which the Roentgen rays are produced. The rays were, however, not allowed to reach the plates, but were focused on the Professor's hand. The hand was then held near the plates for three minutes, and at the end of that time the plates showed a negative of various objects which had been placed in range. The Professor's theory is that "all matter absorbs radio-active energy in waves of varying lengths, and gives off this same energy in waves of a changed and definite length. The energy that has been thus transformed, is characteristic of the matter that gives it forth. The human body gives out the rays, or waves, of this energy with comparative freedom and force. It is to be presumed that the character of the human rays vary in an infinitesimal degree with the person, and that each man, woman and child gives forth not merely the characteristic human light, but a light that is absolutely unique and identifying." The Professor evidently believes that light is inherent in every human body, though it is not effective until some agent, such as Crooke's tube, exerts an influence upon it. It is not so with the light that the true Christian sheds by his life upon the world. That is not inherent in him, but is derived from Christ.

> Reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory (II. Cor. 3:18, R. V.).

BRIEF NOTES

The first chapter of Rev. C. M. Sheldon's latest and his greatest work, "The Narrow Gate," will appear exclusively in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on July 1st. All the characteristics of this magnificent story are strongly drawn. It is a tale which should be read in every home in America. Don't fail to get the opening part of the attention of your friends to it also.

About 1,000 Chinese converts were baptized during 1902 at fifty-eight stations of the China Inland Mission.

The new Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly is Dr. Robert F. Coyle of the Central Church, Detroit, Mich. On the second ballot at Los Angeles, Cal., he received 150 votes, and his election was then made unanimous.

During the year 1902 no less than 3,116,062 Bibles, Testaments and Scripture portions were put into circulation in China by the two great Bible Societies, the British and Foreign and the American.

A remarkable revival has taken place at St. Cloud, a suburb of about two thousand inhabitants near Portland, Me. The Rev. R. Cumming of Detroit, Mich., visited the town at the invitation of the Rev. N. C. Fetter, and has been holding services which have resulted in many conversions.

The American Bible Society reports that the total issues of the year, at home and abroad, amount to 1,000,000 copies. This is an increase of 200,000 copies over those of last year. The issues which were distributed in the United States, including Porto Rico and Hawaii, but omitting the Philippine Islands. This amounts to an increase of 47,804 in the domestic field.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Living Among Strangers

THE sweet words of the Shunamite, who, when asked by the prophet what gift he could bestow upon her in return for her hospitality, answered, "I dwell among mine own," have always made their swift appeal to my heart. A woman whose home is among her kindred and familiar acquaintances, knows very little indeed of the miserable homesickness which is the portion of those who live where all are strangers.

Take, for instance, the familiar illustration of the woman, brought up in a country town, where, walking down the street, she met schoolmates and friendly neighbors at every crossing, and stopped to speak to a dozen people in every excursion to stores or market. She married a man whose business was in a great city like New York or Chicago, and she went to live among a great host of perfectly indifferent strangers. If her home was in an apartment, in a big city like New York, she might live there a twelvemonth and not know her neighbors under the same roof, even by sight. She might have a baby born with no neighbor to congratulate her, or a baby die and no neighbor come to the funeral. In the long, dull hours of her husband's absence, with the housework done, and the people she did know in Brooklyn or Harlem, or Jersey City or Yonkers, miles and miles away, this poor woman might easily be as forlornly alone as if she were a dweller in the desert, in a boundless contiguity of shade. Not every woman has resources enough in herself, in piano, books, and sewing, to help her pass the time agreeably without talk and a glimpse of some friendly face.

The isolation is still greater if the young wife or the older housekeeper choose as a residence some exclusive suburb, where people are hedged about by the traditions of an aristocratic past. In villages that I could name, the old families, reaping pecuniary profit from the incursions of new tenants, yet look down on them from a lofty height, pay a patronizing call or two, but take every pains to guard themselves from intimacy. The new people may have been persons of importance where they came from, but they are distinctly nobodies, or tolerated interlopers, where their tents are at present pitched.

The question is pertinent, "What shall the woman whose lot is cast among strangers do?"

First, let her attach herself to the local church. If there be one of her own denomination, well and good. If not, let her husband and herself confer together and select the one approximating their own communion and attend that, taking a pew, attending the prayer-meeting, and joining in the work of the church. There is no better way to build up a circle of really charming acquaintances in a city or a village than this. The pastor is on the watch for new people. Meet him at least half-way.

Second. Seek out somebody else as desolate as one's self, and show her some attention. In nine cases out of ten the timid advances will be very graciously received, and the lady show that she appreciates the kindness.

Third. Go out of doors every day, for hours, into God's fresh air and sunlight, and be resolute in refusing to mope. Self-pity is the weakest thing under the sun.

Fifth. If you have children, cultivate the acquaintance of their little friends. A mother owes it to her boys and girls to know the mates who share their school and play.

Sixth. Remember, that though you are a stranger this year, you will be an old resident, comparatively, next year, and therefore be on the alert to offer cordial attentions to those newer in the vicinity than yourself.

Seventh. Don't forget that there are good people, kind people, charming people all around you, whom you would like, and who would like you, if only you and they were introduced by favoring circumstance. Maintain an attitude of mental courtesy to all these unknown friends.

A Woman's Enterprise

A daily newspaper, owned, edited, and entirely managed by women, along the usual lines of ordinary daily papers is a novelty, hailing from Chicago. Its projectors disclaim an intention to make a feminine periodical, or to leave out news interesting to men. They propose to show how well a woman, or a group of women, can manage a big undertaking, hitherto supposed to belong to men's management. It remains to be proved how far they may be successful. Also, it is to be hoped that they have money to sink and the courage to be good losers for awhile.

They That Go Down to the Sea on Ships

Sailormen from the earliest times have been the hardy and daring advance guard of commerce. In the old days, when the mariners of Phenicia in their bold degree furrowed the waves, and brought stuffs of rich weave, apes, peacocks, timber and ivory for King Solomon, it was the pluck and enterprise of the sea rovers that bound the world together. To-day the sails of every nation whiten every sea, and the great ocean steamers rush like race-horses over the track of the deep. And still the sailormen are a hardy, superstitious and simple folk, at the mercy of more perils ashore than afloat. Whatever can be done for their protection and comfort when in port, and for their safety, convenience and enlightenment on the waves, should be done. We land-abiding people owe an immense debt to the weather-beaten mariners, who face wild gale and furious billow in our behalf. Many a rough night sees the sailor's wife awake, because her man is in deadly peril. In our prayers shall we not remember those who cruise on the sea?

SISTERS

Daughters of one mother, we
Are like blossoms on one tree.
Love that nothing can alloy,
Love that knows but sweet employ,
Keeps us ever close and near,
Sisters, true and ever dear.

Waste Not

"Throw those cakes away," said a young girl, "they are dry and stale." A little dry, yes, but eatable still, and easily freshened up by a few minutes in the oven. When people somewhere in the world are famishing for food, when in our own land there are some who are never overfed, it is wicked thoughtlessness which wastes good food. Americans are prodigal in waste, and we often hear that a French peasant, or a French noble either, would live sumptuously on what Americans dispose of as trash. No doubt this is true.

AH, WHY?

WHY carry a careworn face, beloved,
Why carry an anxious mind,
There is grace for the day, if you go or stay,
And the Father is ever kind.

You need not fear for the morrow, friend,
If you'll trust it in God's hand.
He will bring you through, though you find no clue
To the reason for his command.

Why carry a weary load, beloved,
Why falter under the pack?
The burdens should drop, where the pilgrims stop,
When the cross o'ershades the track.

If you'll tell the Lord of the pilgrims, friend,
He'll loose the wearisome weight;
You may leave it there, when you utter your prayer,
To the Lord who is loving and great.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Delightful Father

SO many people are brought up to fancy that reading is a waste of time, which might be put to much better account, that I heard with appreciation this story: Rev. Dr.—— always felt impatient if he saw his daughter sewing. "Have you nothing to read," he would say, "that you spend your morning over that stupid needlework?" In his view, reading and study were the real and serious undertakings of life, and sewing was a thing to be neglected. I consider him a delightful father. Yet, most of us have to spend some part of our days over the "long white seam," of which Jean Ingelow sings so sweetly. Mothers must make little frocks and aprons; girls must fashion their shirt waists and skirts, and housekeepers occasionally add to their stock of dainty napery. "I love to make new things," confided a young matron to me, in a burst of vexation, "but I loathe mending. I never sit down to read the paper or a book, that Johnny does not come to me, with 'Mother, will you please mend this rip in my glove,' or Ned ask me to sew up the hem of his trousers, or Polly rush at me with a rent in her frock. I never in the world would have married Joe, dearly as I love him, could I have foreseen the never-ending, still beginning, toil of mending for a family." Poor little tired-out lady! I had a heart full of sympathy as I comforted her, knowing as I did, that though she did not love mending, she did it diligently, and that half her complaint was in the nature of an escape-valve. To tell the plain truth, few of us do enjoy the drudgery of mending, patching and darning, yet there is a certain triumph in making old clothes over until they look like new. Mrs. Wiggs, with her homely philosophy of content, has preached a good many needed sermons to the fretful and down-hearted.

"Now here," she said to Lovey Mary, "Don't you go and git sorry for yerself. That's one thing I can't stand in nobody. There's always lots of other folks you can be sorry for, stid of yourself."

When the mending gets on your nerves, dear reader, push the basket under the sewing-machine, and take a book, or take a walk. The one prescription suits some women; the other is more efficacious for their friends. I recommend open air and exercise as the very best tonic in the whole world for a weary body, and next to that, as a cordial for a weary mind, try an entertaining book. If one can, one should make it a rule, each day to add a little to one's mental wealth, if only by the reading of a bright poem, or a short and pithy essay, or a bit of biography, or a chapter in a traveler's tale.

Disabuse yourself of the idea that to read is to waste precious time, that reading is only for evenings and fag-ends of leisure. I knew a cultivated woman who, having a large family and very small means, used to prop her book before her on the kitchen-table and read a few paragraphs, as she could, while ironing or kneading bread or performing other domestic tasks. The wife of a minister in a country place taught her children their first English and their first Latin lessons, while doing the routine work of the parsonage.

I am sure the father who gave me my text would have counseled his daughter to let no day pass without reading in the best of books, God's Holy Word. Let the sewing go, or the sweeping, or the dusting, if go they must, but neither you nor I can afford to let any day pass in which we do not study in the "roll" given us for our comfort and learning. When the pilgrim neglected his "roll" great trouble came upon him. We neglect ours, and a plague of leanness comes upon our souls.

A few verses daily, or a few chapters, and a whole book now and then, and the scriptures unfold to us glimpses of that better land, which evermore, if we look upward, sheds its radiance upon us.

The Street Boys of Welcome Hall

THE OLD HALL

THE NEW BUILDING

THE "street boy" gravitates from the church, and he is not very available for membership in Young Men's Christian Associations. Welcome Hall precisely supplies his need. It is in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., 185 Chauncey street. It occupies a handsome four-story building of light brick, with which is connected a commodious chapel, with all other necessary rooms. Its terms are free. The street boy cannot afford to pay, even if he were so disposed. It requires about $125 per month, and is supported by voluntary contributions.

Nine years ago, Mrs. Barwise, Mrs. W. H. Christmas, and other good ladies of Brooklyn, observing that the street boy did not seem to fit in anywhere, conceived the idea of a "go-between" between the street and existing institutions, and the result is the present beneficent refuge. Welcome Hall has a board of trustees and managers, and an efficient corps of young women and young men as teachers. Some of these have served from the beginning, and, like the boy upon the "burning deck," stick to their post, faithful, and never weary. Mr. Louis H. Shuler, late of the Bible Normal College, of Hartford, Conn., has recently been appointed to the superintendency. He, himself, was once a street boy. His own experience led him to espouse the cause of the great, neglected army of almost hopeless boys.

SUPT. L. H. SHULER

Sunday and mid-week services are held in Welcome Hall. The best speakers—those with hearts and intuitions for boys—are sought out. Illustrated sermons are often provided, and the best vocal and instrumental music; in all of which the strange audience is sincerely interested. Jesus as the only Saviour, is continually held up. A library and reading room afford food for the mind. Here are found about 500 volumes, and many more could be used if friends would donate them. The young readers find much profit in the illustrated magazines and weeklies. A scrap-book is kept, to which the boys are invited to contribute, and spirited debating classes are maintained. Not a few may now be found in the churches: some singing the praises of God in vested choirs, who before were roaming ragged in the streets.

Basket-making, weaving, carving, modeling, sketching, experiments in electricity, and many useful arts are taught upon a scientific basis. A sewing class of fifty girls is also maintained. Nor is recreation forgotten. The games consist of almost every known harmless device. These boys hold the championship of Brooklyn in the game of "basket-ball," having taken the honors in a match with the high school team. A well-drilled "boys brigade" offers physical discipline and military practice; while the gymnasium provides all the exercise for which it is designed.

The savings bank of Welcome Hall is the boy's depository, by means of which many of the boys, from their meagre savings, have accumulated quite a fund. A committee of "Mercy and Help" seeks out and distributes contributions of clothing among the more needy boys. Everything possible is done to elevate the moral and spiritual nature of the boys, and to increase their self-respect. It pays a handsome dividend to "invest money in boys"—the men of the coming years.

SEIZING OPPORTUNITIES*

Earnestness and Discretion Needed in Bearing Testimony for Christ

MANY Christians shrink from introducing the subject of religion in the society of strangers or mere acquaintances, lest it should provoke ridicule and do more harm than good. It cannot be denied that indiscreet Christians do, at times, by the utterance of some pious and well-meant phrases, cause religion to be evil spoken of. Not long ago, a young man and his sister invited their friends to a supper and evening of fun. Scarcely had the young people come together, when the father of the host and hostess entered the room, and with a lugubrious face, announced his intention of spending the evening in reading the Bible and prayer, which, he said, would be more profitable to all present than indulging in idle games. As a matter of fact it proved most unprofitable, inasmuch as it excited a prejudice against religion in the hearts of his children and their guests which is little likely to be eradicated. On the other hand, other Christians conceal their religion so effectively, that no one suspects them of being Christians.

Ordinary discretion ought to prevent faults of either kind. When a man so acts that there can be no mistake as to where he stands, when his allegiance to Christ is firm and outspoken, opportunities for service open to him. There is no need to force the subject at inopportune times. His example exerts an influence, and friends, in time of trouble and sorrow, know where they can get religious help. Times come, too, when there is opportunity for judicious advice, and when great good may be done by the simple statement of what a help religion has been in practical life. A man really in earnest, ardently loyal to Christ, never lacks an opportunity of bearing testimony, and it may be done without any suspicion of cant or ostentation. The Apostolic advice does not inculcate unseasonable preaching, but rather a readiness at any time, whether it be a preaching day or not, to take advantage of a propitious opportunity.

CORN STARCH TALK

With Receipt For a Delightful Dessert

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG

Is it not strange, knowing that starch is the most important factor in our foods, that we do not make more use of Corn Starch, which furnishes so much food value in a convenient form, easy of use, readily assimilated, and inexpensive?

The quality of the Corn Starch used, however, has much to do with its palatable taste and digestibility. Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch which has been used for 55 years, is of unquestioned purity, and never disappoints in results. Try this brand in the following appetizing desserts and see if Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch is not well worth a prominent place in your pantry.

SNOW BALLS.

Cream a third of a cup of butter and a half a cup of sugar gradually. Sift one cup of flour with half a cup of Kingsford's Corn Starch and three level teaspoons of baking powder. Add this mixture alternately with about two thirds of a cup of milk and stir in gently the stiff whites of four eggs. Place this batter in six well buttered cups and steam for half an hour. Turn out gently, roll in powdered sugar and serve hot with STRAWBERRY SAUCE.

Cream half a cup of butter with one and a half cups of powdered sugar, add the yolk of one egg. Add a cupful of crushed berries just at serving time. Any fruit in season may be used in this way, for either steamed or baked puddings.

SOME OF THE CHILDREN CARED FOR BY MRS. NORWOOD AT BUCARAMANGA

MISSIONARIES IN WAR TIME

FROM the South American republic of Colombia, distracted by war for the last two years, comes news of the condition of the American missionaries who have not been heard from in many months. The Rev. Joseph Norwood and Mrs. Norwood are stationed at Bucaramanga, Colombia, where, for several years past, they have been doing an excellent Gospel work among the natives. Mr. Norwood writes to the editor of the CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Your favor of Feb. 15, 1900, to Bucaramanga, Col., enclosing your check, was nearly two years old when it reached us at our home in the interior of Colombia.

Thus it has been with many other letters and a few remittances that were sent to us there in response to communications published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. On my arrival here a few days ago, I found a number of letters addressed to me, care of the American Bible Society, which had not been forwarded because all postal communication was cut off for about three years.

We succeeded in getting a few letters from Bucaramanga to the coast or across the Venezuelan line, by friends, who worked their way through the militant lines during the disastrous war which raged there from Oct. 17, 1899, until December last.

Thousands of reconcentrados, both rich and poor, were confined in our city for months at a time. The state of privation, suffering and starvation was simply heartrending. From the beginning, Mrs. Norwood had the house full of homeless and poverty-stricken women and children, and fed hundreds from the door during the whole time. She kept an open dining-room on a prominent corner in the city, in which from 80 to 112 substantial dinners were served daily. Hundreds of the sick and starving, who would otherwise have received no attention, were moderately well attended, the doctors furnishing their services and prescriptions, and we giving the medicines and attending the sick, some in the hospitals, many in their own home, and hundreds who came to my office for medical attention. The money to defray these expenses was furnished in part by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by the writer's using his entire salary, and from other sources. From Nov. 1, 1899 to Nov. 1, 1902, in the various branches of our work; namely: 1st, attending the wounded of six bloody battles; 2d, the care of homeless women and children; 3d, attending the destitute, sick and suffering; 4th, the soup kitchen; the amount of money used in Colombian currency was about $285,750. This, at the varying rates of exchange current in the country, from first to last, amounted to about $13,625, American gold. We kept no accurate accounts until Nov. 1, 1902, when many of the good citizens of Bucaramanga voluntarily offered assistance to our work by way of monthly subscriptions. An advisory committee of ladies was appointed to co-operate with Mrs. Norwood in directing the affairs of "El Hogar Cristiano para Ninos Desamparados" (Christian Home for Helpless Children), which had become a fixture. Other committees and a treasurer were chosen.

We earnestly solicit the special prayers of all God's people in this trying and very important God-given work.

JOSEPH NORWOOD.

Mrs. Norwood writes from Bucaramanga as follows:

We have at present in our home thirty children, and we earnestly pray and work for their salvation, and expect them to become workers in the Lord's vineyard. Besides our work in the Home, we are keeping up during the absence of my husband, the usual chapel services and prayer-meetings for men and women. A layman reads a sermon at the regular hour, and we are expecting God's blessing on our humble efforts.

The work in Colombia has been one of years of seed sowing, with apparently little fruit; but the Word that has been sown with many tears will yet produce a glorious harvest. Are our friends at home praying for Colombia? We want more laborers, and we know they will come. ALMA PENN NORWOOD.

Answered Prayers

A mother, Sykeston, N. Dak., writes:

Yesterday as we sat at dinner we looked out, and saw a prairie fire about a mile away, with a high wind driving it toward us; it seemed as if we would surely be burned out. I took it to the Lord in prayer and he sent help, so that we were safe.

A mother, Asbury Park, N. J., writes:

God granted the deepest desire of my heart by converting my two sons, the only children I had. One gave his heart to Jesus when twelve years of age, had a clear and bright experience of the power of Jesus to save and keep, and was early crowned. The other, converted when young, became a backslider, but Jesus brought him to himself again, and thence transferred him to the fold whence none can stray.

E. B. G., Syracuse, N. Y., writes:

A year ago this month, I prayed God to help me accomplish something that I had tried three times before to do in my own strength, failing each time. God has answered.

E. M. R., Worcester, Mass., writes:

I am a subscriber to your paper, and am greatly helped by this department. I believe prayer is, indeed, "the world's great altar stairs which lead thro' darkness up to God."

A Mother, Summerville, Ga., writes:

God has not only answered special prayers of mine, but in answer to daily prayer, he has given me peace and comfort through all the trials of every day.

CALLED HIGHER

"My mother, Mrs. Margaret A. Craig," writes Mrs. J. S. Davett, Glasgow, Del., "who has passed away, was a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. She was seventy-two; she had long been ill, but was always cheerful, sunny and loving. She died in the triumph of a Christian faith."

Chaplain Milburn's Courage

MANY years ago, before the late Rev. W. H. Milburn became Chaplain of the U. Senate, he was a circuit preacher in the West. It is related that one day, while traveling by steamer between Cincinnati and Wheeling, W. Va., he found among the passengers a number of Congressmen, on their way to Washington. Many of them swore outrageously, played cards day and night, and drank vilainous whisky to excess. On Sunday morning, not having landed, Dr. Milburn was asked to preach. An audience of three hundred assembled. He took his stand between the ladies' and gentlemen's cabins, and seated upon his right and left hand were the Congressmen. As he neared the close of his address, he decided to speak a straightforward word to them, delivering himself spontaneously in these terms:

"As I have rarely seen men of your class, I felt on coming on board this boat a natural interest to hear your conversation and to observe your habits. If I am to judge the nation by you, I can come to no other conclusion than that it is composed of profane swearers, card players and drunkards. * * *

Consider the influence of your example upon the young men of the nation—what a school of vice are you establishing. If you insist upon the right of ruining yourselves, do not by your example corrupt and debauch those who are the hope of the land. As an American citizen I feel disgraced by your unseemly behavior.

"As a preacher of the Gospel I am commissioned to tell you, that unless you renounce your evil courses, repent of your sins, and believe upon the Lord Jesus Christ with hearts unto righteousness, you will certainly be damned."

The blind preacher went to his room. Shortly afterward, a Congressman entered, and in behalf of his companions, acknowledged the justice of the rebuke, and presented the preacher with a purse of $150 as a token of appreciation. At the same time he asked Dr. Milburn's consent to the use of his name as a candidate for the Congressional chaplaincy. After some hesitation, the preacher consented. Thus, by a single act of Christian courage, he won powerful friends, and a position which enabled him for many years to do effective Christian service at the National Capitol.

William the Conqueror

William E Reardon is a second "William the Conqueror." In building his business he was as hard as Nails. Nothing seemed to be too much for him. He had been selling The Saturday Evening Post on a work on the east coast in Maryland. Just before Christmas, when most boys are home to spend the Holidays, he received an offer from the publishers promising a cash prize to the Maryland boy who would sell 500 copies. He had not even had to do any work like that, but was so focused a new plan. Excited at the thought of selling to Strangers, he enlisted his father to telegraph for 500 copies to be sent to Midland.

As he received the copies from the postmaster a Midland boy who was also an agent for The Post, received a bundle containing five copies. The little girl with a big smile and a cheerful word, told Master William that he didn't "like his looks" and that he had better go back home again. The little Conqueror declared he would "show him right there," so he made a pile of the bundles on the floor where people were waiting for the mails, mounted the pile and addressed the crowd. He stated that he represented Benjamin Franklin's old paper—that he had just received the Christmas number—that it was the best issue ever published. Before leaving he had sold fifty copies of The Saturday Evening Post. He spent the rest of the day among the business men, finding buyers everywhere. What was left he sold the next day from house to house. When he left for home the day after New Years he found the other boy who said The Post and advised him to "ginger up."

"I am eight years old," our Conqueror writes. "I never before tried to earn any money; but you can put me down for the first prize whenever you make another prize offer in Michigan."

WE WILL START ANY BOY IN BUSINESS selling The Saturday Evening Post after school hours and on Saturdays. The first week's supply of 10 copies is sent free. Over 6000 boys are selling The Post. Some are making over $15.00 a week. You can do the same. Write to-day.

$250 next month in extra cash prizes to boys who do good work.

The AMERICAN STUDENTS' CHURCH HOME IN BERLIN

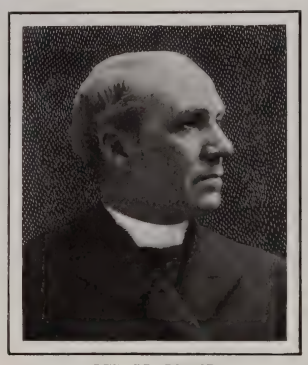
MANY American students of limited means, save for years that they may be able to finish their education in the University and the Conservatories of Music in Berlin. All of them find that living in that city is much more expensive than they dreamed. Many are obliged to take the cheapest rooms in the back part of a house, where the sunlight never penetrates. Fire is an extra item, and so they do without it as much as possible. Many of them practice in winter with a rug over their knees, and a shawl or cloak tied round them, with fingers stiff and numb.

In going abroad these students make a great sacrifice. On this side of the water, it is considered a fine thing to go to Europe to study; but were you to know the discouragements, the privations, and the homesickness of these young people, your hearts would be moved. Many of them would not have gone had they known beforehand all the difficulties incident to life in a foreign city, and amid customs strange. Often in church, when the old familiar hymns are sung, you can see the tears running down the cheeks of some lonely, homesick girl. After service the leaders of the church go to her, and she is invited to the home of the pastor, to the Sunday evening gathering, for singing, worship and social service, and to the Thursday reception.



REV. DR. DICKIE
Pastor American Church Berlin

What these young American students in Berlin need is a place to which they may come every day and at any time; where they may receive not only spiritual help and cheer in their homesickness, but where they may tarry to read and write. Thus the church-home is intended to become a rallying point and a radiating point for the students. This is one great part of the work of the American Church in Berlin.

Happily, though this church has existed so long without a building, at last it sees a church it can call its own. It is already under roof, and $10,000 will finish and furnish it without debt. This is no foreign church, nor are those attending it foreigners; but your own sons and daughters.

The music teacher goes to Berlin to fit herself to teach your children; the medical student returns to be your physician, and the theologian to be your future pastor. On the whole, it is a very earnest, hard-working company of young people. They do not go for pleasure; but, by hard work, to fit themselves to give of their best, as God has given them talents to be developed. In appealing for this church, we have often heard it said that there is no need for our young people to go abroad; that we have just as good music teachers here, and that our universities and colleges are just as well equipped as those of Europe. Then why do they come? The writer was lately dining with one of our wealthiest Californian families. In this home there is a very gifted daughter. The mother said: "I will have no teacher for my daughter who has not studied with the best known German professors. I hope, some day, to take my daughter to Europe, and I do not wish to have her spirit crushed by being told that all her methods are incorrect, and that she must begin all her musical education over again." So long as preference is given to musical instructors with a European training, so long Americanyoung people must make every sacrifice to go across the sea. Therefore the American church needs to heed the call to render these young people service, and the American people to help make that church efficient in its work.

Sometimes one is found among the students, who has come to Berlin to study, and the funds that were expected from home fail to come. In one case, the lady student kept a diary. One day there was written in it: "No more money—no more food. Sin and shame—or death, which shall it be?" The second entry was: "I will not fall. I cannot beg. In this foreign country I must die." Another case was a young man whom the pastor met in a street car. "You're an American." "Yes." "How long have you been here?" "Eighteen months." "Have you been to the American church?" "No. I have been avoiding Americans, in hopes the better to learn the language." "Yes; and how are you getting on." "I have got where I can go no further. I have no money to stay here, I can get no pupils—and I am starving! He was asked to play in church and he proved an excellent musician. The days of his trouble were over. It is for work like this the American Church exists. It is, as Dr. Theo. L. Cuyler so well says: "One of the most important lighthouses to be kept burning on the continent of Europe."

A HEROINE FOR CHRIST

THERE are many good people who are eager to be engaged in Christian work of some sort, yet who find it hard to decide upon the direction in which their energies should be expended. For the encouragement of this class and of many others, we give below the remarkable life-story of a woman, who, though deeply afflicted, has yet been able to render most effective service, in the Master's name, to many of her fellow-beings.

MISS THEODOSIA HAINE

Sixteen years ago, Miss Theodosia Haine, of West Farmington, O., was a bright young student in the Western Reserve Seminary. She was suddenly attacked with an illness which not only cut short her college career, but left her a helpless invalid and cripple for life. Since that time she has seldom been able to leave her room, till of late when she was moved to Warren, O. But though she was an invalid and a shut-in, she did not mean that her life should be one of inaction. She had already developed a beautiful Christian character, and she resolved to employ all her energies and abilities in helping others. She began making pompons of thistle blossoms, and later of the silk of the milkweed. She wrote letters to the inmates of Ohio prisons, each letter with a booklet, card or poem, which were highly prized by the prisoners.

She had heard of the work of Mary Ashton, a deaf and lame girl, who in ten years time raised and paid in to the W. F. M. Society of the Methodist Church, $12,500.00. Miss Ashton had lately died. At the time of her death she was supporting three women missionaries and a Bible woman in China, and also one in India. Miss Haine took up this work, and with the aid of many friends and helpers has kept up the missionary support from year to year, the main source of income being from the sale of leaflets, booklets, banners and bookmarks.

Miss Haine, while at work, is supported among her pillows. She suffers much, but will not use any drug or opiate. Here is a brave and cheerful spirit, and by daily toil and daily prayer she has accomplished much.

The names of the Mary Ashton missionary workers are: Clara J. Collier, Chenter, West China; Helen Galloway, Chunking, West China; Alice Linam Yeuping, Foochow district, China.

Miss Theodosia Haine, whose address is 405 Adams street, Warren, Ohio, will gladly furnish to inquirers any information they may desire concerning these missionary workers.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM CXXXIII
Household Psalm

ehold, how good and how pleasant it is for en to dwell together in unity. 2. It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments.

"THE PRECIOUS OINTMENT"

Contention and strife cease when this Psalm gets a grip on all members of the family. The perfume of peace is in every heart. The house is changed into a home and the abiding guest is the Prince of Peace. This truth is not only for homes where there is anger and malice, but for hurch as well.

PSALM CXXXIV
Preacher's Psalm

Bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, by night stand in the house of the Lord.

2. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the Lord.

"LIFT UP YOUR HANDS"

No preacher can lift up holy hands in God's sanctuary and "Bless the Lord" or worship him, but what he will be blessed by him, and a minister blessed by God will be a blessing to the people. A good life is the greatest sermon, and a preacher who is a servant of God will obey him and not the world or its ways. An obedient Christian has one of him who made heaven and earth. re is a vast difference between the frown od and the favor of God.

PSALM CXXXV
False Gods' Psalm

The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, work of men's hands. 16. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not;

17. They have ears, but they hear not; neither is there any breath in their mouths.

18. They that make them are like unto them: so is every one that trusteth in them.

"IDOLS OF THE HEATHEN"

The false gods of fashion and folly replace the ones of Egypt's day, and both alike are bad. Some bow to gold, some to fame, some to fortune, some to creed, and some to church; but the true and good alone to God. They make use of all 's gifts, but worship only him. Neither money or machinery can duplicate es 6 to 11.

PSALM CXXXVI
Mercy Psalm

O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: is mercy endureth for ever. 2 O give thanks unto the God of gods: for his mercy endureth for ever.

3. O give thanks to the Lord of lords: for his mercy endureth forever.

4. To him who alone doeth great wonders: for his mercy endureth forever.

"O, GIVE THANKS!"

He who gets mercy will give it, and he who gives it will get it. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." That is the Diamond of the Beatitudes. The Pearl is "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see d." If mercy be thy companion, Peace Prosperity shall follow close behind. y, they will overtake thee, and often run ead. Micah 6: 8, goes with this Mercy Psalm.

GOLD OR GOD*

The Lesson of the Incident of the Rich Young Ruler

PEOPLE have found in the incident of the rich young ruler, in all periods of the Church's history, an admonition against the possession of property. It must be admitted that it is the poor more frequently than the rich who have taken this view. The instances are few and far between of rich men, like Tolstoi, acting literally on the injunction. Still, there have been instances, but they are not encouraging. We doubt whether this would be a better or happier world, if every rich man sold all he had and gave the proceeds to the poor. While there are many among the poor who would be benefited by a gift from the rich, and while there are many ways in which rich men might wisely spend their fortunes for the benefit of the poor, it would be good for neither rich nor poor for every rich man to distribute his property indiscriminately among his poor neighbors. A careful reading of the story shows that Christ had no such leveling process in mind.

The rich young ruler was boasting. He had a good opinion of his own character and conduct. He had kept the commandments from his youth up. He was so good that he was not conscious of lacking anything. As Christ looking upon him, loved him, we may be sure that he really was a fine, excellent kind of man. But he was not in the state of mind that a true follower of Christ should be in. He was too proud and self-satisfied. A man feeling as he did, could not realize his need of a Saviour. It was necessary to humiliate him. Therefore, when he challenged Christ to point out a defect in his character, our Lord laid his finger with unerring insight on the sore place. If he would be perfect, let him sell all he had and give to the poor. That was a test that revealed his character to himself. He had the impression that spiritual things were the highest good. Christ showed him that he was deceiving himself. There were things that he held in higher esteem. The only way of convincing him of the fact was to give him the alternative. We may be quite sure that if Christ, looking into his heart, had seen that he did not value religion more than property, no such condition of discipleship would have been made.

O GOD, send Thou to me,
Thy message true;
Teach me Thy will, Thy way,
And what to do.

So calm and clear,
That age will make me young,
And life more dear.

THE "JAMES AND HARRIET WOOD SUNSHINE LODGE," DARIEN, CONN.

HOW SUNSHINE CHEERS THE WORLD

FOR the Annual Meeting of the International Sunshine Society, in New York, May 21, there was this year an unusually interesting programme, including, besides the formal gathering and reception, a chance for visitors to see points of interest in the big metropolis.

The year has been one of most encouraging progress in sunshine matters. Many new branches have been opened. The James and Harriet Wood Sunshine Home of Darien, Conn., is now open, and children are cared for there with every comfort. Branches of the International Sunshine Society are furnishing the rooms. Mrs. Herman A. Curiel has furnished a college, to be called "The Mignonette E. Curiel Cottage, in memory of her little girl.

The Sunshiners of Dubuque, Ia., have been the means of giving much sunshine to many little invalids. They have furnished a ward in the Finley Hospital. There are five beds for children. A child may go in free, and the members of the Sunshine Branch take turns in going to the hospital to help mend clothes, read, or play with the convalescents. This is the work of young girls from 4 to 12 years of age. This branch is most enthusiastic in the good work. It is older than the International Society.

The Tottori Sunshine Branch, with Mrs. S. C. Bartlett as president, has voted to pay two cents a month to help their Sunshine work.

During the recent overflow of the Mississippi River, the Sunshiners in Memphis made a record the Society may well be proud of. The Mayor placed at the disposal of the Sunshiners the quarters of the Old Board of Health, which consisted of two floors of separate rooms and many conveniences. An entertainment was given by the ladies of the Maccabees to assist the Sunshine members. Four hundred took tickets. When the Galveston flood brought so much misery to many, the Sunshine members came to the rescue, and by earnest work were able to succor the unfortunates who had lost everything in the flood.

One year ago plans were laid to open the Sunshine Lodge at Livingston Manor, Hillcrest, N. Y., in order to give many helpless children a home. The boys are taught farm work, and the rudiments of such trades as they are best fitted for. Several new buildings will be put up this year. Donations of books for the library or clothing for the children will be promptly acknowledged. The President is Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden. Packages may be addressed to Sunshine Lodge, Livingston Manor, "For Hillcrest," care of the Postmaster.

The CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch has at present 1,027 members; 202 of these have joined us in the past year. Among the number are many shut-ins and invalids with various ailments, so that the 1,027 are not all active. The shut-ins do much towards the alleviation of suffering.

Among our members is one who makes little booklets, containing scripture verses and pretty pieces of poetry which scatter much sunshine. Another collects cancelled foreign stamps, which are sent for distribution among those making such collections. From the different letters received, we find bundles of half-worn clothing have been sent to those in need of it. Then, too, literature has been distributed among sailors, to those in workhouses, asylums, hospitals and many other places where such materials are appreciated.

This report closes with the sincere hope that the Sunshine Society may grow daily in magnitude, and that those who have tasted of its goodness will help to spread its influence all over the world, and thus make the world better and happier for having known the International Sunshine Society.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Bible Students' Helper

MINISTERS and Sunday School teachers, and Christian workers of all kinds, are indebted to Dr. James Strong for the work which he is justified in describing as The Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible. It is by far the best work of the kind we have seen, inasmuch as the student, with its aid, can put his hand quickly on the passage he needs, if he can remember any word of it. The analytical method, which is useful as a test of the temper and patience of the student, but not otherwise helpful, Dr. Strong carefully avoids. It is just the plain alphabetical method, pure and simple, that he follows, and therefore his book can be used easily by any one who knows the alphabet. There is, too, an advantage over Cruden, in the fact, that proper names are not set off in a department by themselves, but appear in their alphabetical order with other words. The student, therefore, does not have to hesitate whether he shall look for such words as Zion or Jew in one department or the other, but is sure to find them under their initial. The advantage of this method will be well understood by every one who often uses a concordance.

In addition to the main features, which constitute the chief use to the ordinary reader, Dr. Strong gives another department, equivalent to a Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldee Dictionary. Reference to this is by numbers in the main Concordance. Thus, the phrase (Lev. 7: 37), "This is the law of the meat offering," is followed by the number 4503. By turning to that number in the Dictionary, the student finds what is the Hebrew word translated "meat offering" in the passage, and what is its exact meaning. This department is invaluable to the student who is not familiar with the original languages, and yet needs to know the exact rendering of a particular word.

Another valuable feature of the Concordance is a list of the changes made by the Revisers, both English and American. Each one has a sign against it by which the student learns not only the change made, but whether it is approved by the English or American Revisers, or by both. The book, with its additions, contains 1,808 pages, and is sold by Eaton & Mains, New York, at $6, in cloth.

PRISON PREACHING

ul's Message From His Roman Prison

By Mrs. M. Baxter

AFTER three months spent at Melita —our modern Malta—a vessel was found bound for Italy, and, landing only at Syracuse, in the nd of Sicily, where Paul and his com- y stayed three days, they next landed Rhegium, on the west of Italy, and the t day went on to Puteoli. Here they nd brethren, children of God, and they e at home in this new land. Here y were invited to remain seven days, , as nothing to the contrary is record- it is probable that this visit did take ce, and we see by it how lenient was treatment of Paul. Probably a sol- r was always told off to guard him, erwise he seems to have had full lib- y. From here, probably, the news of ul's arrival had spread to Appii Forum, l the Three Taverns, from whence thren came to meet them.

What must have been the meeting of se members of the body of Christ? ey had never seen one another in the h, but, no doubt, they had heard of e another, and now it was one life, one pe, one suffering and opprobrium which y shared; one passion for the glory of d, and the salvation of souls, through offering of him whose name they re. It must have been a time of quick- d faith and of joy in the Lord, in spite Paul's circumstances as a prisoner. hen Paul saw the brethren, "he thanked d and took courage." Here was the cleus, in the very centre of the world- wer of that time, of a Christian church, ich, from that centre, might spread oughout the world, and Paul took cour- e: he saw why he must see Rome. The iency of Paul's treatment continued. o doubt when Julius delivered up the soner to the captain of the guard, he d something of Paul and of his won- rful life and prayers during the voyage, Paul was not placed in the common son, but dwelt by himself with a soldier at kept him.

Thus we see that Paul's voyage towards me was not regarded by him as a kind interregnum in his service, a kind of liday, when he could relax a little. here are Christians who, when they ke a time of rest, do relax, and act in me ways differently from their usual stoms, when all eyes are upon them in eir Christian work. But a man or wo- an who can thus change cannot say th truth, "Not I live, but Christ liveth me," for Christ is not one thing at one ne, and another thing at another time. hrist in Paul when he preached, was hrist in Paul when he labored at his ade, and Christ in Paul on board ship, d Christ in Paul under guard in Rome. here was invariably in him the seen and lt presence of his Master. He always, d in all circumstances, acknowledged d honored God.

Arrived in Rome, he, after three days, lled the chief of the Jews together, to ve an account of himself as having been ought prisoner to Rome. He showed em how in Jerusalem he was delivered er to the Romans for judgment, and en he brought out the burden of his eart. "For this cause, therefore, have I alled for you, to see you, and to speak ith you, because for the hope of Israel I m bound with this chain." The Jews eclared that they had received no letter oncerning him from Judea, neither had ny of the Jews from thence showed or oken any harm of him, although it was vident that they had heard of him. But," they said, "we desire to hear of ee what thou thinkest; for, as concern- g this sect, it is known to us that every- here it is spoken against."

The church had come into the heritage f her Lord. "If they have persecuted e, they will also persecute you; if they ave kept my sayings, they will keep ours also; but all these things will they o unto you for my name's sake, because hey know not Him that sent me." The ews appointed a day, and there came nany to Paul's lodging; to whom he ex- ounded and testified the kingdom of God. He expounded the Scripture on wo points; one was to explain the spirit- al nature of the Kingdom of God, prom- sed in the Old Testament: the other vas to show Jesus the promised Messiah.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

B. H. W., Norfolk, Va. In a Baltimore paper of a recent date, late in April or early in May, I saw the following declaration as coming from Bishop Foster, made at a banquet given by the Sugar Trust, and uttered during the McKinley campaign. These are the words ascribed to him: "Rather than see Bryan elected, I would be willing to go to sea in a boat of stone, with oars of iron, sails of lead, and with the wrath of God as a breeze and hell as my port!!!" Can that be a true statement?

No, it is not true. Bishop Foster never made any statement on the subject. The Pittsburg Christian Advocate gives an authoritative explanation, in which it says that the charge was made that Bishop Fowler used the language quoted on the occasion in question. We quote from the Pittsburg paper:

The bishop made no such statement with reference to Mr. Bryan. He was speaking of imperialism, and said in substance this: "Imperialism! It is absurd. The President cannot resist the will of the people, the will of Congress. They have decreed what has been done, and no man can resist them. I should not dare undertake it. To quote the language of a Chicago orator: 'I'd rather go to sea with a boat of stone, with sails of lead, with oars of iron, with the wrath of God as a gale, and hell for a port.'" The striking and extravagant language was not original with the bishop, but was used by a brilliant Chicago lawyer when President Johnson was accused of resisting the will of the American people.

Reader, Portsmouth, Va. Please inform me where I can obtain the words of an old prophecy, commencing, I think, this way, "Carriages without horses shall go."

The words are attributed to Mother Shipton, who is said to have been born in Yorkshire, England, about 1486. She was regarded as a prophetess or witch. She died in 1561. Her identity, and even her existence, are in dispute, and the so-called prophecies attributed to her are believed to have been hoaxes, written at a much later period.

W. H. H., Whiteside, Tenn. If the ten commandments are intended to govern our lives why do we not keep the seventh day holy instead of the first?

If you are satisfied with basing your Christian life on the ten commandments you are logical in keeping the seventh day. In this age you should have reached a higher plane. Christ's teaching shows you that "Thou shalt not," is a mere negative religion. You need to go beyond that, and to enter into the new revelation which calls for positiveness and spiritual activity. The absurd literalism which clings to a particular day is of a piece with the other formalism that makes these Pharisees not Christians. We keep the first day holy, because it commemorates the resurrection of Christ, which set us free from all the Jewish ritual. The law was "the schoolmaster to bring us to Christ" and we will not leave him to go back to the old laws which have been superseded by the better Gospel.

John W. H., Washington, D. C. What does the statue on the dome of the Capitol of the United States represent? Is it an Indian woman? Who is she?

The figure on the dome of the Capitol building at Washington is a bronze statue of Liberty, designed by Thomas Crawford, the artist, and was cast at Bladensburg, Md. It is over nineteen feet high and weighs seven and a half tons. It cost twenty-four thousand dollars, and was set in place on Dec. 2, 1863.

R. L. C., Hominy Creek, N. C. 1. When a man is conscious of hating sin; when he enjoys the society of Christians and rejoices over the salvation of sinners; and when he earnestly seeks to live as Christ would have him live—may he regard himself as converted, even though he cannot designate the time when the great change occurred? 2. Ought remorse for past sin prevent such a person taking part in Christian work? 3. What is the meaning of the statement (Rom. 9: 18), that God hardens certain people?

1. The evidences you cite are, to our mind, strong ground for believing that conversion has taken place. They imply a change of nature such as the new birth produces. The mere question of not being able to designate a time is of no moment. In some cases the change is so gradual as to be imperceptible. The difference is seen only when one looks back to a time when an altogether opposite condition of mind existed. A new test can now be applied in growth. If the divine life is there, as we believe it is, it will bear fruit in such graces as the Apostle cites in Galatians, 5: 22, 23. 2. The memory of past sin should produce humility. It should not lead, as it often does, to self-glorification and boasting; but it should never be an obstacle to Christian work. It should rather be an incentive to it. Such a person is often specially qualified to rescue others, because he knows, by sad experience, their state of mind. 3. The goodness of God, when it is resisted, has inevitably a hardening effect. The same result is often seen in families. A boy of fine spirit, who is forgiven for wrongdoing, is won over to a better life. A bad boy forgiven, is liable to rejoice at getting off easily and going on in evil, feeling sure of receiving forgiveness. The father's kindness produces opposite effects in the two boys. God hardens no man's heart; the man hardens himself, by trusting that he will escape punishment always, because he has done so heretofore. We know that Paul's words carry the other meaning, but if you read the previous and the following chapter, you will see that he is quoting objections to his argument, for the sake of answering them.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOK DEPT.
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY

Subscriber, Topeka, Kan. I saw in a book of travels recently, a reference to the tomb of Eve. Is there in existence a tomb reputed to be the grave of the mother of all living?

The tomb you refer to is near Jeddah, in Arabia. The Mohammedans reverence the memory of Eve and have built a mosque over the grave. Two parallel walls three feet high and 370 feet long are supposed to enclose the grave, and at its foot two date palms have been planted. Within the mosque there is a stone which is said to cover the actual place of sepulture. It has been worn thin by the kisses of reverent pilgrims, who for centuries have visited the grave. Of course, the idea that Eve is buried there is nonsense.

Mrs. W. S. A., Sherman, Ala. 1. What do rose bushes and all kinds of shrubbery need when alive but at a complete standstill? Grape vines in the same yard, the same way, haven't grown over a foot and a half in two years. Running roses not over two feet, while one alone put out at the same time, and getting the same attention, has reached the top of the house and put out a great many branches. 2. Why, in so many hens' eggs, instead of hatching, does the shell come off, leaving the skin dry around the chicken, which always dies when the egg-shell comes off that way?

This letter we referred to W. Atlee Burpee & Co., the famous Philadelphia seed producers, who answer:

1. In all probability, the cause of the rose-bushes and shrubbery being at a "standstill" is that these are in need of fertilizing and feeding up, so as to promote renewed growth, especially as the lady refers to the more recently set vines and bushes making a satisfactory growth. Let her put a liberal application of well-rotted manure about the roots of the dormant plants and trim them back slightly so as to start a new strong growth. If possible, the manure should be dug into the soil carefully so as not to injure the roots of the plants, and if the soil has been washed away from the roots to any extent and they are exposed on the surface of the ground, it would be well to put on sufficient good soil about the roots to entirely cover them from view. In trimming back, merely shorten the two or three best shoots on each plant or bush to about two feet in height and then trim out all dead wood and any other weaker branches or vines so as to throw the entire strength of the plant into making strong, fresh shoots or vines. 2. Regarding the dry skin inside the egg adhering to the young chickens when hatching, we would state that in our opinion this indicates a lack of sufficient moisture when the eggs are hatching. Under natural conditions, the birds lay their eggs or make their nests on the soil, which serves to keep the shell of the egg comparatively moist, and where hens are sitting in box nests, two or three inches of fresh soil should be put in the bottom of the nest when preparing it for sitting, to furnish a supply of moisture at this season of the year. It is also an excellent plan to moisten the eggs one or two days before they are expected to hatch.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. What does the term Renaissance, so often used by lecturers, signify?

The literal meaning is a new birth. It is used generally in reference to the revival of something that has fallen dormant. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries are often referred to by that name, on account of the revival of letters and art then witnessed. The style of architecture known by that name also dates from the fifteenth century. It was a transition period, marked by mental activity in all directions.

O. C. C., Millstadt, Ill. 1. How many soldiers were assigned to guard Paul? Acts 12: 4 says four quaternions. How many soldiers would that be? 2. The same verse mentions Easter; was Easter observed at that time?

1. A quaternion consisted of four soldiers. There would, therefore, be sixteen soldiers engaged in guarding Paul. Probably a quaternion relieved another every six hours. 2. Probably not, and certainly not by anyone besides Christians. The Greek word translated "Easter," is pascha. It should have been translated the Passover, and it is so given in the Revised Version. The translators of the Authorized Version were more familiar with Easter than with Passover, and as the two are celebrated at the same time, they used the word most familiar to them.

Edith, Minneapolis. What is the origin of the prejudice against being married in the month of May?

Two sources of the superstition are assigned. One is that as April was consecrated to Venus and June to Juno it was a slight to both these mythological beings to pass by the months over which they presided and take the month between. The other origin is that during the month of May occurred, under the Roman rule, the festival of Lemuria, when oblations were made to the lemurs, or spirits of wicked men. During the celebration women took no baths, left off their ornaments and used no cosmetics. It would consequently have been deemed a lack of good taste on the part of a Roman girl to be married in May. Whether either of these is the correct source of the prejudice we cannot be sure. A prejudice easily arises, and is confirmed when some instance like that of Mary Queen of Scots, who married Bothwell in May, seems to give proof of it being true.

Mrs. J. B., Portland, Ore. Is the following quotation correct, and where can it be found?

> The cares that infest the day
> Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
> And as silently steal away.

The quotation is from Longfellow's The Day is Done.

A reader, Kansas. As a child, I was trained to think that gum chewing was a disgusting habit, and not to be tolerated in company. Lately some very good friends of mine, have chewed gum during church and Sunday School. Am I behind the times in considering this ill-bred, or is this one of the latest accomplishments?

It is a habit not tolerated among well-bred people, at any time, and which, if indulged at all, should only be indulged in the privacy of the home. To chew gum in church is altogether inexcusable, and argues a total lack of reverence and proper decorum.

Praying Believer, Philadelphia, Pa. When a Christian desires something very much, ought he to be content with presenting it to God in prayer and there leave it, or should he press the matter in frequent prayer?

It depends largely on the character of the object. We can imagine a man praying for prosperity, or for relief from physical suffering, or that some trial might be removed. In such prayers, the thought must enter that perhaps the blessing sought might not be in accord with God's will, that possibly the burden that we want relieved has been laid upon us as a discipline, and will be removed when its object is gained. Paul's prayer for the removal of the "thorn in the flesh" was of this kind. He besought the Lord thrice for it, but the prayer was not granted. In such cases it is best to leave the prayer with the Lord and wait his time. On the other hand, the prayer for the conversion of some beloved child or friend, the prayer for guidance and Christlikeness and similar prayers, may be continually offered and persistence is encouraged.

General O. O. HOWARD Writes of His Latest Journey Through the Wild Kentucky Hills

OUR company of six divided at Louisville, Ky.; a part to go straight to Cumberland Gap, in order to attend the exercises of what we call the Commencement of Lincoln Memorial University, situated at that bird-nest centre of mountains. My friend, a young lawyer of Boston, Mr. Frederick C. Chamberlin, and General Howard were to begin a long-contemplated ride up the forks and valleys of the Kentucky River, to the highest points of the ranges, and thence go over to the Lincoln Memorial, some sixty miles further, there to rejoin their friends. One object was to fulfil a promise to be present at the opening of a Log College on this Squabble Creek. Another object will appear in a brief statement of how best to give an honest lift to the mountain youth whose parents have had a hard struggle in life. In my judgment, our great givers to the mountain work of education have been persistently led in a mistaken way. They are told, by leaders and educators, "to stir up interest by great meetings in the large centres of the Southern and border States." The interest is already stirred up. Plans are already formed, and workers are occupying portions of the extensive field. What is needed is means to push forward the campaign already begun, not to waste money where it will never reach the people for whom it is intended.

If the liberal givers are led in vain to stir up interest by public meetings and much writing, let not those who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD make the same mistake. Whatever they give should be given directly to the work already in hand.

Dr. E. O. Guerrant, the president of one of the most effective of the mountain spiritual enterprises, which now supplies over fifty stations in the most needy parts of these mountains with genuine, hard-working teachers, having just returned from a long journey in the interest of his work, met us at Wilmore, Ky. We enjoyed the hospitality of his home for an evening and morning. Then we were off through Lexington and on towards Jackson, just now famous in feud developments. At the last station, Elkatawa, we stopped. As Dr. Guerrant could not come himself, he sent with us a member of his family who knows the route, and the people, almost as well as the doctor himself does.

It will be remembered by your readers how we gathered the people—men, women and children—at Athol, the Parmelee cottage, and at Elkatawa, where was the torn tent. This time, we only searched among the farmers for a horse and mules to carry us over the hills; but we were made to feel that we were friends. The mountains coming down close to the valleys are cleared part way up on the sides; but the trees on top and all along are so abundant that they seem a continuous forest. Men, women and children, sometimes with mules and ploughs, and sometimes with hoes only, are putting in the corn. Everybody is cheerfully at work. We felt some twinges of pity to see the women who have the care of numerous children, working in the fields,—this always in addition to their ceaseless care of the household and the children. Their burdens are too heavy, and will certainly be lightened as true knowledge of ways and means creeps up the valleys and brightens the crests of these mountains.

At Canoe we were royally entertained. Every settler far and near was using his horses or his mules, still we were generously provided with mounts, and a hearty "God speed you!" General Howard had to go about half a mile after dark along the bed of a creek. Charlie Callahan, a boy of fourteen, guided him: he led him by the hand over rough places and found the stepping-stones in the stream: he prevented his falling down the steepest places where others had been hurt: he hushed the barking dogs at Turners; and he said, as he delivered him safely back at the lodging place, "I've holped you some, I reckon." Dear little fellow! He wouldn't even take "a tip," but just wanted to do a kindness. This I find to be universal among the boys and girls of the mountains.

At Crockettsville, Berry Turner, the masterful man of whom I wrote before, and the venerable preacher and teacher, Dr. Saunders, met us at the horse block with offer of hospitality. There the good wife had a dinner for us near eleven o'clock, and little Matilda the ten-year-old child, sang to her cabinet organ and played marvelously, though hardly able yet to read a note.

Provided well with a mount and with a guide in John Turner—a lad of thirteen years—we were soon ascending the ruggedest steeps, and in a couple of hours we were passing the broadest of open fields, lying up against the sides of the mountains, with the whole force of the people up there in picturesque dresses preparing the ground or planting. We emerged into the region of Squabble Creek.

I wish I could describe it. Where Dr. Guerrant with Miss Louise Saunders, and where General Howard had, last September, selected a site in the broadest valley, with hills and valleys all around, we now found the Log College, which Miss Louise had promised, already constructed. It was a great surprise to me: so large, so handsome, so well made. Already there appears a main building very properly named "Guerrant Hall," with four nice, airy rooms, with furniture of home construction. The main auditorium, which is not yet finished, holds the entire upper story. Just think of it! In each of the four lower rooms were the students, running in age from six years to eighteen, and each room had an instructor. The Rev. Mr. Murdoch and his wife (Miss Louise is now Mrs. Murdoch), with two other teachers, make this a lively and happy place. As we stand on the front porch and look southward, we notice that pretty foothill, a little detached, crowned with bright green foliage, and the church, which had the bell, not far from the top. Last fall this was a school, a church, and a general assembly-room, where the people for ten miles around constantly met; but now it is only the church. One of the forks of the Kentucky river winds in and out beneath the high mountains, and is fringed all along with a great variety of trees. Nothing in nature could be more beautiful than this region. This very morning, the trees far and near were sparkling in the fresh sunlight, while the mists were rising, and the air was filled with sweet songsters.

The land is more fertile, and more of it is nearer horizontal than vertical, than any we have seen in our journey since we left Athol. One of the largest houses is Mr. Gross's, and the neighborhood is called Gross. He has a new store of general merchandise which has been finished since I was here last fall. Mr. Gross has a large family, but seems able to accommodate travelers who ride along the horse-paths. Some of the roads are called wagon-roads; but it is a marvel how a wagon can get over the hills, and along the rocky beds of the streams.

At the opening of the college, which Mr. Murdock has named Witherspoon College, Rev. Dr. Saunders and his wife were present the first day, and our entire party was present the second day. When Mrs. Saunders returned to Crockettsville, she rode in a wagon over the mountains; but I am sure she had to walk at many parts of the roadway. It is a mystery to me how any wagon can hold together, bumping over these rugged rocks.

A Minister's Joys

TEXT—Psalms 16: 6:

"The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places."

DIFFERENT occupations often imply different enjoyments. All varieties of flowers do not thrive equally well under the same colored glasses. The amusements which would be exhilaration and restful relaxation for the physician, may be drudgery and irritation for the merchant. The owls and the bats turn their days into nights, and their nights into day. The eagles and the hawks do not circle about in the heavens unless they can heat their feathers by the flaming fires of the sun. The inhabitant of one home may be deaf and blind to the pleasures surrounding another fireside.

In the backwoods I best learned this interesting lesson. With my family I was spending a summer vacation in the country. In a row-boat, far from a railroad station, I was tracing the bendings and windings of a little river. Suddenly, at a turn of the stream, we came to a small house nestling under the protecting branches of the tall trees. I found there a woman living practically alone. She had no children. All day long her husband was off to work. I said to her, "This is an awful place to live! You must be lonely and heartsick, with no companionship." "Oh no," she answered. "I am never alone. I have hundreds of friends who call and talk to me every day. Do you see that little nest just at the end of my porch? Well, last spring the mother bird came here as a bride, and asked me if she could build her home there, and I said yes. Then she talked and chattered on all the time she was building it. She brought me her husband and introduced me to him. She told me when the eggs were laid, and when the eggs were hatched. She is one of my friends. Then, just over there, under that bank, a muskrat has his home, and is raising his family. He comes out every little while and blinks at me and talks in the sign language. Then, there are my friends the wild-flowers, and my friends the chickens, and my friends the fish which I feed at the dock. Then the river itself is a friend of mine. It has a language of murmurs and gurgles to which I listen, and when I get tired and weary I am soothed by its sympathy. Oh no, do not pity me for being alone. My enjoyments are perhaps not your enjoyments, but they are many, very many. I would not exchange my life for that of any one I know." Happy woman that. Happy, because she was in the place where she could use the qualities with which God had endowed her. Happy, because, like a bee, she was able to find every flower filled with nectar for her lips. Happy, because every tree branch was to her a choir-loft, in which a master soloist was singing the sweetest song in all his repertoire.

The Happiest of Occupations

Well, my friends, as I needlessly pitied that poor woman living in the backwoods, there are hundreds and thousands of people commiserating the supposed unhappy lot of a Gospel minister. These sympathetic commiserations have become widespread. There are hundreds, aye thousands of young men, who might otherwise have volunteered for service in the Christian pulpits, have been deterred on account of them, from consecrating themselves to the Gospel ministry. Now I want to speak specially this morning to the young men who are graduating from our colleges and schools, and if they have adopted this view of the Christian ministry being a joyless, gloomy life, I want to set them right. I make a direct appeal to the young men to enter the Gospel pulpit, because it offers the happiest, the most blessed, and the most exhilarating life on earth. I am going to make this plea with autobiographical authority, by showing the kindnesses and the sympathies which have surrounded me, from the day of my ordination down to the present time.

The first objection generally made to the occupation of a minister, is that it is not a money-making profession. That is true; but it does offer something far better in the joy of noble consecration. We have all at some time proved the truth of Christ's words, that it is better to give than to receive. When the bower-bird of love builded her home for the first time in our hearts, we immediately tried to manifest that love in many different ways. We laid at the feet of our lady-love our gifts, as the wise men from the East came to the Manger with their presents of gold, and frankincense and myrrh. We manifested our love in the little attentions we daily bestowed, and in the letters we would write. As time passed on, we again manifested that love in the engagement ring which we tremblingly placed upon the finger of our future bride. Has any money we have since earned ever given us such joy as that which came to us in the happiness of her smile, in the welcome of her voice, and in the knowledge that we were winning her affections in return for our affections. My young friend, did you ever stop to consider that the Christian minister has such joys as these, which make the acquisition of a fortune appear in comparison low and sordid? Apart from the rewards that God gives to the faithful minister, there is a joy in the self-surrender, in the consecration of our whole lives to Christ, who laid down his life for us.

The true artist has a deep sense of the inspiring exhilaration, when he surrenders his life to his art. Only the other day a young man left my Chicago church to go to Europe and study in the foreign Art schools. I said to him, "Why do you follow this profession? In all probability you will only eke out of it a bare living. You will have years and years of financial struggle ahead." "I know it," he answered, with a smiling face, "but though I may not make much money, I shall have a higher reward than money. I would be willing to live all my life in poverty if I could only continue to know the joy of trying to interpret the higher message of the soul in the language of colors."

Not Measured by Money

The true soldier does not think of money, the mere question of money, when he surrenders his life to the service of his country. In all probability he will never have anything to live on, but a mere pittance of a salary. Yet, he willingly dons the soldier's uniform. He willingly promises to suffer and starve and, if need be, to die for his country's good. While promising to make this sacrifice, he feels happy in the resolve. Cannot the minister in the same way feel the exhilaration of a noble consecration? I know that the compensations of the Gospel minister cannot be estimated by the standard of mere money. I know there are many men preaching week by week in the pulpit, who, if they had entered the law or a mercantile life, would have an annual income of five, ten times the income that they receive as ministers. But does not the joy of giving your whole life to the service of Jesus Christ bring some rewards higher than money? Does not the thought that you are trying to save men, and comfort men, and bring men to the Saviour whether you are standing by the opened casket, or by the sick bed, or on the street, or in the pulpit, give you transcendent, and at times almost overwhelming joys.

That these spiritual rewards are real and satisfying is demonstrated by the fact that the ministers are the only class of men who, as a rule, want their sons to follow in their own footsteps, and their daughters to marry men of their own profession. If you go to an average lawyer, and ask him what he would like his sons to be, he answers, "Almost anything, rather than a lawyer;" to a physician, anything but a doctor; to a newspaper man, anything but an editor; to a merchant, and you will often find him struggling and saving so that he can give his boys a college education, for entrance into some professional career. But a consecrated minister invariably wants his sons to enter the Gospel ministry. If you ask your pastor this question: "What would you like your son to be?" he will in all probability answer: "Well, I would not like to persuade my boy to be a minister. If he becomes a minister, I do not want him to be a man-made, but a God-made minister. But if the Holy Spirit should ever work upon his heart, I think the happiest day of my life would be when I could hear him preach in a Christian pulpit. May God give me this joy." When some one asked Henry Ward Beecher why he entered the Gospel ministry, he answered: "I could not help it. Who ever heard of Lyman Beecher's son doing anything else but preach?" The reason all those boys became preachers was because Lyman Beecher instilled into their hearts what the joys of the Christian ministry might be. Over half of my seminary classmates were the sons of ministers. The happiest day in my father's life, I believe, was the day he preached my ordination sermon, and finished it in a voice trembling with emotion, and with eyes moist with tears of rapturous joy. Oh, young men, who feel to-day the yearnings for the Gospel ministry, I know, that if consecrated, you will have the happiest, most joyful, and the noblest professional life that is now open to any Christian man.

Influence Invested

But the joy of self surrender is not the only reward. The Gospel ministry affords more opportunities for usefulness than any other profession. Every true man wants to make the most of his earthly life. If he has ten talents, he wants to use them where they will be most effective; if he has only one one talent he wants to make that one talent useful. Like a capitalist, he wants to invest his mental and spiritual talents where the investment is sure, and where he can get the most returns for the principal invested. Where can a cons crated, educated young man have more influence f good than in the Christian ministry?

When the young man graduates from the theologic seminary, he immediately takes his place at the head a country or city church. What does that mean? Sin ply this: The young man immediately becomes th leader of a consecrated band of Christian workers, wh are ready to work for Christ in any way the young past directs. It means that his individual personal influenc is doubled, trebled, quadrupled, aye, a hundred-fold i creased by the consecrated band of workers who we come him into his new charge. It means that by th power of his Christian and for him, he can in time absolutely dominate a whol region for good. Study the history of Jonathan Ed wards in Northampton, Massachusetts. Study Lyma Beecher's ministerial career in Litchfield, Connecticu After he had been for a short time in his new parsonag a mighty revival swept over that town. When som one congratulated him on the results, he answered "Do not congratulate me. It is not my work, but tha of the two hundred and fifty consecrated praying me and women who are working by my side." Study th life of Moses Hoge of Richmond, and of the late Doc tor Palmer of New Orleans. "But," says some youn man, "why do you cite the careers of great men? I an not a great man, and never will be." The same Gospe success which came to these consecrated men upon a large scale, can come to you, a consecrated young min ister, upon a smaller scale. Young man, I tell you that it is impossible for any consecrated minister, either in the country or the city, to be surrounded by a praying, work ing band of faithful followers, and not have his life tel mightily for good in the region in which he lives. Ought not such an influence for good bring a joy, a rapturous joy, in the heart of Christ's preachers? Cannot all truly consecrated Gospel ministers, on account of the infinite opportunities of usefulness which have been opened to them, joyfully chorus the glad pæan which was once sung by the sainted Horatius Bonar:

Colaborers Working With Him

I thank thee, Lord, for using me
For thee to work and speak;
However trembling is the hand,
The voice however weak.

For those to whom, through me, thou hast
Some heavenly guidance given;
For some, it maybe, saved from death,
And some brought nearer heaven.

The Gospel ministry is a profession whose members are treated with respect and universal kindness. How with respect? The very lowest and most depraved are generally silenced at their approach. When the minister comes around, the blasphemer's lips are closed, the lewd story is untold, the evil thought is unexpressed. When the Catholic priest, on an errand of mercy, enters the lowest dive, every head uncovers, and every cursing tongue is stilled.

Sympathy Assured

How with kindness? Because from the very moment you step into it, there are scores and hundreds of people who will do everything in their power to make your life happy. When installed in a charge, the church reception will show you how many friends you have, and how welcome you are. When your baby is sick, there are always many sympathizers to come around and bring the flowers, and, if necessary, help in nursing. When the autumnal fruits arrive, there are the tokens of love in gifts of jellies and apples. There are the Christmas presents of chairs, and other knickknacks. These gifts may not have much money value, but they show the true beatings of the hearts of a loving and sympathetic people. An aged reformer of England, when dying, was asked what was the greatest want of this world. He answered, "Sympathy." The true Gospel minister rarely feels the need of this gift. He has the sympathy of his people in his church work. He finds heartfelt sympathy, wherever he goes. I know that there are certain churches unsympathetic and mean. I know there are some churches which were started in fiendish rows, and are now contemptible churches, and have ill-treated their ministers for generations. But these mean churches are the exceptions—the rare exceptions. The vast majority are filled with good men and women, who are doing all they can for their ministers. At great personal sacrifice, they are denying themselves in many ways to show their pastors love and kindness. It is into such a happy fellowship of pulpit and pew

A LOG COLLEGE FOR MOUNTAINEERS

At the opening of the college, the farmers far and near left their planting, and came in their best "outfits" to participate in the exercises, parents and children together. You see, then, that the interest is intense, and could not be heightened by a meeting in Richmond, Va. If you know your geography, you will see that Richmond is a long way from Squabble Creek. I know that Squabble Creek is not on the map; but the Kentucky river and the forks which come from little springs in the very tops of these mountains, are put down on the map in little crooked lines which do not indicate much, till one has taken a ride through this most picturesque region.

Dr. Saunders made the speech at the opening. He told too, how Pennsylvania was developed, little by little, to become what it is to-day, rich in every resource; and he showed that these portions of Kentucky, and Tennessee, and the Cumberland country,—have as great natural advantages as Pennsylvania. There is nothing that Pennsylvania produces, which may not be found here in equal abundance. The different varieties of timber which in spring time are floated down the forks and into the broader rivers, in long rafts: the railroad ties which furnish the whole country: the coal which crops out on every hand; the oil wells that are appearing here and there, crowning the hills like towers of observation; the raising of vegetables and grains; the sheep, the hogs, the cattle, and every product, animal and mineral, of use to man. There is indeed, nothing in the line of fruit-raising which is found in the temperate zone, that cannot be planted in many of these valleys. Here and there, there are already the nicest of orchards and vineyards springing up. The light is breaking in through such missionaries as Dr. Saunders, Mr. Murdock and others, with the intensely active and energetic E. O. Guerrant behind them.

Of course, the first care of the missionary is to reach the minds and souls of the people, particularly of the youth. Mr. Murdoch, at the opening, gave his hearty attention to these things, namely, the culture of the mind and the heart. The people have already responded generously to every call. With very little to give, they have already given the land—good, broad space, where little land can be spared; they have furnished the lumber and hauled it to the grounds and watched every step, from the first breaking of the soil to the putting on of the roof of the main building, with indescribable interest. They are doing what all our institutions are doing -- they are preparing the way, and before three years, will be sending out capable teachers, who know the mountains and the mountain folk.

From Cumberland Gap, from the Harrow Hall and the Grant-Lee Hall, we have already sent out into thirty-eight districts, thirty-eight well prepared teachers. From Berea College to Grant Lee Hall is one hundred and ten miles. From this, Witherspoon College will be but fifty or sixty miles. The former two are linked by a railway. These two will some day be linked by a railway. These three institutions may be noticed as each at the apex of a triangle. The triangle is the strongest figure in architecture. You will like the thought that here is a triangulation for the upbuilding of humanity, for the winning and the saving of the souls of men.

It was near the middle of the afternoon when all the children and young people were called together into one of the four rooms of the college, rather closely packed on the rough benches, for comfort. There were about sixty of them. It was a pretty picture, these children, with their teachers, and the soldier organ. There was one good lady to play, and another to stand full of interest and enthusiasm, with just a little tinge of possessing care in her face, to lead their songs. General Howard and his friends, with the coat of the service still upon them, were warmly welcomed. First, a few sanna of praise to Him from whom all blessings flow. Then followed Mr. Murdoch's very pleasant introduction, stating how General Howard had participated in the beginnings of the college during last September, and how he had promised to return and be present at the opening of the institution. Then one of the bright children whose photograph is presented to our readers.

The General then endeavored to talk to them in a manner and language that they could all comprehend. He spoke of his trip and of the friends who had come with him. He spoke of the past and present, and the hope of the future. He obtained quick responses from the children, though many of them were too bashful to speak out; and when he wanted to make a point, or leave an impression, he would first give an expression of it, and then have the children repeat it two or three times. At last he gave them a motto, telling them that little story about a gentleman who said that the four words of the motto which his mother taught him had always been the means of the greatest good to him. They were the four words which Hagar spoke when, after great sorrow and fear, hope sprang up in her heart, as she said, "Thou God seest me." The children said those words over and over again, and the General promised to send them this motto, in good form, that they might see it and remember it always. After prayer and singing, including the repeating of our Lord's Prayer together, all of the young people, little and big, met General Howard at the door and took his hand.

It is a beautiful opening; a well-spring in the mountains, and I am sure will be a compensation to Dr. Guerrant, who has labored so hard to bring his campaign to the very crest of the mountain tops. Will not all your readers join me in saying: "Lord bless his work," and then send him some help, be it ever so little?

My next letter will take up the new ground of the fifty or sixty miles to Cumberland Gap from the log college Witherspoon College is named in honor of the only clergyman who signed the Declaration of Independence.

OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,
Major-General U. S. Army (Retired).

hat I welcome the consecrated young men of this day, by welcoming you into the Gospel ministry.

The Christian ministry is a profession in which the members are shielded from many of the temptations that confront men in other walks of life. Richard Baxter once declared, that the minister had to face the greatest of all daily temptations. He lived in an exceptional period, and I do not believe he would have said so had he been living in this day. Temptations come to the pulpit, but not with the same virulence and bitterness as they assail the pew. The Gospel minister, by his official position, is under the influence of good associates. He has surrounding him, some of the best men and women who are inhabitants of the community in which he lives. These Christians are not only praying for his work, but also for him. We all believe in the power of prayer. Is there to be no direct result upon the minister's life, on account of this spiritual association? When I entered college, two or three different secret societies wanted me to join their organizations. One was composed of men, notorious for their dissipations. They were drinkers, cardplayers, carousers. Another was a poorer society financially, but was composed for the most part of noble Christian boys. I said to myself, "I cannot afford to place myself in a position where I may be surrounded by men who drink and gamble. I will join the society which is poorer financially, but whose spiritual members will lift me up, instead of dragging me down." The consecrated Gospel preacher in the same way, is always surrounded by good men and women, and not by bad. He cannot, if he would, associate with evil companions, or go to questionable amusements, or desecrate the Sabbath. If he did, he would be immediately debarred from his pulpit ministrations. Therefore, my young friend, you should desire to enter the Gospel ministry for these purifying and holy associations that will lift you up, instead of dragging you down.

The Gospel minister has the same temptations as other men! Why, that is absurd. I do not believe I am what I am because I am stronger than other men. I believe I am what I am because God has surrounded me by praying men and women and hemmed me in with noble influences, and bound me hand and foot with the golden manacles of their petitions. If these holy associates should be taken away from my life, I would tremble for what the results might be. Suppose I were a poor farmer, elected to the State Legislature. Suppose the lobbyists wanted to purchase the right of way for a railroad franchise and offered me a $5,000 bribe. Would I take it? I do not say I would; but I thank God Satan has never been able to tempt me with the chance. Suppose I were a Chicago Police Captain on a small salary, living every day in fear that my official head would be decapitated. Suppose that, by shutting my eyes upon a few houses of evil resort, I could have an income of $10,000 per year. Would I take it? I do not say that I would; but I thank God I have never been placed in such a position of temptation where I had the chance. Suppose I wanted to become a physician. Suppose I had to enter one of our modern medical schools in which are crowded, among many students, the infidel, the blasphemous, and the lewd. If I should take such a medical course, would I come out as pure morally as I did after I had lived for three years in a Christian Seminary? My young friend, if God calls you to be a lawyer, or doctor, or legislator, or police captain, or merchant, go ahead and be what He intends you to be. He will give you strength to resist any temptations that may come in your way, if you will, only ask Him. But if He calls you to be a Christian minister, and you deliberately turn a deaf ear to that call, I tremble in reference to your future. I tremble for your spiritual life when you have to face the temptations that beset the average man in the outside world. I tremble when you shall not have the guarding, guiding, protecting influence of praying men about you, such as surrounds the average life of the Christian minister.

The enumeration of the joys of the ministerial life would not be complete if I omitted to speak of the crowning joy which awaits the faithful minister at the end of his earthly career. That is the greatest joy of all, and even though a minister, through some unhappy combination of circumstances, missed some of the joys I have mentioned, he can never miss that. The servant of Christ who has faithfully preached the Gospel, unknown, it may be, to fame, seldom heard of in high places, yet working earnestly for his Master, will one day appear in the presence of his Lord, who has seen and known his humble service all along. What joy will fill that devoted heart when Christ shall say to him, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Is not that a joy worth working for? That greeting will reach the ears of some who have borne many hardships in the service, some who have toiled in lifelong poverty, in sickness and sorrow, yet persevering to the end in proclaiming the glorious Gospel of the Cross. How those words of appreciation will fill the heart with gladness! Poverty all forgotten! The burdens all lifted! Depreciation all wiped away. The faithful minister enters by royal invitation into the joy of his Lord. Who can describe that joy? It passes human power and is beyond human language. He enters into it and we lose sight of him in the glory which the eyes of men cannot look upon.

I have preached this sermon, showing the joys, the spiritual safeguards, and the infinite usefulness of the Gospel ministry for two distinct reasons. The first, there never was a greater need than at the present time for young men to enter the Gospel pulpit. A few years ago, the capitalist, the statesman, the merchant prince, and leading lawyers considered it an honor to sit in the aldermanic chairs of our great cities. Now, for the most part, these positions are despised by the intellectual and financial leaders, and are filled with professional politicians and men who are weaklings and often dishonest. Once there was a time when the greatest honor that could come to a family was the honor of a son dedicating his life to the Gospel ministry. Now, the current of popular opinion is running counter to this line of noble service. Our strong young men, instead of entering the pulpit, are giving their lives to the law, to merchandise, to railroads, to electrical sciences. Who are to fill the future pulpits of America? "Give us men," cry our theological professors. Their classes are growing smaller year by year. "Give us men," cry the churches; "we cannot get the right kind of men for our pulpits." "Give us men," cry the synodical missionaries. "The harvest is ripe, but the laborers are too few." It is all nonsense for some of our religious writers to declare that the reason our theological students are becoming less and less in number year by year, is because we are now getting quality instead of quantity. The reason our seminaries are becoming depleted, is because the young men who ought to enter the ministry refuse to come. Men! Men! We want men! We need men for the Gospel pulpits, to save the sinful world.

The second reason for preaching this sermon, is that I would appeal to those young men to enter the Gospel ministry who, many years ago, heard the call and who have stifled it by an indifferent wayward life. When my uncle, the devoted missionary, Rev. John Talmage of Amoy, China, was a boy of twelve, he read the life of David Brainerd. After closing the book, he went to my grandmother and said: "Mother, I am going to be a missionary." Time passed on, and he entered college. He lost his high ideal and led an indifferent life. He never mentioned the word minister from that day, until towards the end of his college career. Then the old pledge came back. Then and there, on the night before his graduation from Rutger's College, he gave himself up anew to his glorious Enterprise. Young men, you who have heard this call to the Christian ministry years ago, will you not hear the call now? Will you not be brave enough, noble enough, Christian enough to do what Christ bids you do? The church needs you. Christ calls you. Come, offer your life, and consecrate it at the altar of Christian Ministry.

BETWEEN DELFT AND THE HAGUE

MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE'S recent purchase of a valuable estate at the Hague—the Hotel du Vieux Doellen—for the purpose of erecting a great Peace Palace and International Arbitration Library, has this summer directed the attention of American travelers in Holland to the natural beauties of that country, in a greater measure than in preceding years. It was a graceful compliment to Queen Wilhelmina, the hostess of the first Peace Conference, to locate the Peace Palace in her territory.

The Hague is the most charming city in Holland. The Hotel du Vieux Doellen is a homelike resting place, long famous for its cuisine. Here the Peace Commissioners stayed during their congress. All its appointments and service are excellent. Queen Wilhelmina's Palace is only a short distance from the hotel. It is a magnificent structure, filled with choice presents, given to Queen Sophia, and later to Queen Wilhelmina. In one of the salons, at the entrance of the palace, is a table made of Russian malachite, and presented to the late Queen Sophia by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia. It cost $150,000. Another present, which stands upon the mantelpiece in the ball-room, was given by the Empress Eugenie of France to Queen Sophia. This is a Sevres china clock and two immense vases. It represents a value of $200,000. The portraits of William the Silent and William III. hang upon the walls of the long gallery, and are most lifelike. The present Emperor of Russia sent a costly table to Queen Wilhelmina, and the King of Italy, a Florentine table of exquisite workmanship, on the occasion of her marriage. In the dining-room of the Queen's private apartments, the furnishings are of greenish hand-embossed velvet, and the carpet and silk tapestry hangings are in light brown, shading to amber. The clock on the mantelpiece belonged to Marie Antoinette, and is very beautiful.

In the cemetery near at hand, DeWett is buried. He wished his coat-of-arms cut upon the slab, but not his name. Such modesty is rare, in these days of vainglory. In some parts of the city, there are still traces of the eight years' war with Spain. The guide delights to tell that the Americans were more fortunate than Holland, because they ended their war with Spain in six months, while poor Holland had to pass through eighty years of trial, but at last was victorious! He adds: "No Spaniard comes here."

The picture gallery at The Hague holds the renowned "Bull," painted by Paul Potter in 1600. There are also some masterpieces by Rembrandt, a perfect picture of "The Virgin and Child," by Murillo, and many others of great beauty.

One of the charming drives at The Hague is Schoeningen, a famous watering-place on the coast. The drive passes under an arbor of trees, and on each side of the road costly residences with beautifully laid out grounds, greet the eye. The "House in the Wood" (Huis t'en Bosch), is one of Queen Wilhelmina's favorite haunts. It is very picturesque and artistic, and she loves to stay here. Her private apartments suggest comfort as well as luxury. Looking out of the windows, you see well-kept gardens and shrubbery, forming a perfect landscape. Striking pictures of the Empress Eugenie, Napoleon III. and U. S. Minister Motley, adorn the exquisite drawing-room. The power to make and keep friends must have been the great charm of Queen Sophia, as everywhere in Holland one finds her name honored and loved.

Though there are many picturesque historical memories clinging around the "House in the Wood," probably that which will longest endure is associated with the Circular Room, where the World's First Peace Congress was held, and the International tribunal formed. Notwithstanding recent wars, the peace idea has taken root and though the "world's peace" is still a beautiful and distant dream, the best minds are looking more hopefully to a brighter day dawning, when all disputes between nations will be settled by an appeal to reason and not a resort to arms.

The Hotel du Vieux Doellen, is beautifully situated in the centre of the Hague. It is not an imposing building on the exterior, except that it covers a whole block. The broad plaza in front is edged with magnificent trees, and just beyond there is a fine drive, which is usually filled with equipages. The government of Holland, having accepted Mr. Andrew Carnegie's offer of erecting a building, to be used as an International Arbitration Library, and also to be the permanent headquarters of the International Court of Arbitration, have selected the site of the Hotel du Vieux Doellen, as the most desirable for this purpose.

Holland, with its windmills, quaint people, rare gems, the gifts of crowned heads of Europe; its history, and its girl Queen, holds a spell over the hearts of the nations that can never be broken. It is the ideal land for the propaganda of the Gospel of peace, that will yet bring the world into perfect accord.

THE ALBANIAN WAR-CLOUD

WITH the subsidence of the Manchurian troubles, Albania looms up, larger than ever, as the centre of disturbance in Eastern Europe. The Rev. Hugh Callan, D.D., has well described Albania as a "land of the mountain and the flood; a land of ancient customs, ancient garb, ancient feuds; a land of clans and tribes, each embittered against the other; a land of individualism, where social right is smothered by the right and might of each individual unit to do as it pleases." Each clan has its hereditary chief, whose authority the Turks have found it prudent to recognize, by giving to them the rank and title of "bey," and each clan is wholly self-governing, both in the administration of justice and its relations to other clans and to the Sultan's representatives. Taxes enforced most oppressively in other parts of the Turkish dominions, are unknown to the Albanian mountaineers, and recruits for the Sultan's armies are obtained by voluntary enlistment, instead of the compulsory system prevalent elsewhere under Ottoman rule. These recruits make the Sultan's best soldiers. Of the million and a half of Albania's population, about one million are Moslems, of European descent, and they are always ready to fight under the banner of the Crescent, for the love of fighting and loot, and not because they hate the Christians, for the Albanian Moslem is far from being a fanatic in religion, and it is said that many of them worship as Christians in secret, while professing Mohammedanism in public.

Now, Austria and Russia have demanded that these Albanians be restrained from lawless attacks on their Christian neighbors, and that they shall be punished for the crimes they commit upon the representatives and subjects of friendly Powers. Whether the Albanian soldier who murdered M. Stcherbina, the Russian consul at Mitrovitza, was or was not executed, is uncertain, but it is easy to understand why the Turkish authorities might hesitate to enforce the sentence in fact, while deceiving Christian Powers with the assurance that it had been carried out. Even the Sultan himself would not be safe against an Albanian blood-feud, or, as the Albanians call it, "taking back blood." The capital punishment of an Albanian would make it imperative on his clan to avenge his death, and the assassination of one or more officers of the Sultan, held responsible for the execution, would almost certainly follow.

The Sultan is aware that in coercing and punishing the Albanians, he is incurring personal danger for himself and his ministers.

The Albanian problem is much more likely than that of Macedonia to involve international differences. There is no European interference with Austria and Russia in dictating to the Sultan as to his course in Macedonia. Italy, on the other hand, will not tolerate Austrian or Russian predominance in Albania. Italy has long regarded Albania as a coming inheritance, and any Italian administration consenting to its occupation by Austria would invite a tidal wave of political rebuke. The Albanians themselves also—at least the Moslem part of them—are more anxious to fight Austrians and Russians than to battle against the Turks, and they would undoubtedly resist to the last any attempt to impose on them the Austrian yoke.

The pressure upon the Sultan, however, by the Christian Powers, has been intensified by the recent murder by Albanians of another subject of the Czar, and sixty thousand Turkish troops are marching to subdue the fierce mountaineers. The latter will, in all probability, make a determined resistance, and perhaps bring about a most perilous international situation.

NORWEGIAN CHURCH, PENSACOLA

LEADING BUSINESS CITIZENS OF PENSACOLA

OLD "CHRIST CHURCH," PENSACOLA

IS PENSACOLA the OLDEST CITY?

IN a book on colonial Florida, a recent writer has asserted that Pensacola is four years older than St. Augustine, and he appears to prove his assertion. He denies that it takes its melodious name from a tribe of Indians once located in that vicinity, holding that it comes from the old Spanish port of Peniscola.

AN ANCIENT GATE IN ST. AUGUSTINE

Pensacola Bay was discovered thirty-six years after Columbus discovered America, and was named Santa Maria Bay. From 1540 to 1554 it was the designated base for De Soto's expedition; but the first town was not built till 1559. The place was abandoned in a few years, after having grown to considerable size, and boasting a population of two thousand souls. It was again occupied and rebuilt in 1696, this time around a strong fort named Barancas, and it soon became the seaport, both of the Spanish and French residents in Florida and Louisiana. In 1719, after having been captured a second time by the French, the town was burned; but, being restored to Spain in 1723, the place was rebuilt, for greater security, on Santa Rosa Island, where the bay separated it from the mainland; but a hurricane destroyed it nineteen years later, and the population settled on the present site, on the north side of the bay. The treaty of Paris, in 1763, gave Florida to England, and during the twenty teeming years of British occupation, Pensacola was laid out in wide streets and generous squares. Florida was taken back by Spain in 1781, and the British garrison took ship for Brooklyn. But during the war of 1812 the British were allowed by the Spanish governor to use the port for military and naval operations against us, so Jackson took it and expelled the British, late in 1814. Again, during the Seminole war, 1818, Jackson had to capture Pensacola, because of the hostile attitude and acts of the Spanish officials. Florida was ceded to us in 1821.

Florida is a timbered country, where stone is scarce, and this may account for the surprising fact that not a single structure of any kind remains to mark the British occupation, while the Spaniards have left little else than the ancient gates and fort at St. Augustine, and Fort San Carlos, at Barancas, on Pensacola Bay. Pensacola now has a population of some 20,000.

In the most prominent spot in the city has lately been finished the new Christ Church, on the corner of Palafox and Wright streets, at the head of Court House Square. Very appropriately, it is of the old Spanish Mission style of architecture, and, I was told, is one of the finest churches in the South—certainly, the finest and most attractive in Pensacola. The first service in this church was held on Easter day. The last service was held in the old Christ Church, which is located on Seville Square, in the lower or old part of the city. This edifice was dedicated in 1832, in place of an earlier building, and it stands on the site of the British camp, where waved her standard and the cross of St. George from 1763 to 1783. Many famous people have worshiped in this quaint old church. Ivy, planted so long ago by devoted hands, has quite covered the northern side. Leaving the old church, towering above the modest buildings of the ancient town, with its sound of the breaking surf, I ascended by electric car to the new Christ Church on the hill, beyond which lies the soldiers' monument dominating the modern town, whose pretty homes stretch back among the palms and pines.

The Presbyterian and Baptist churches are attractive buildings, as is that of the Norwegian Seamen's Friend Society, on South Palafox street, near the principal landing.

The name of Florida's most distinguished Indian chief is perpetuated in the title of the Osceola Club, a large and successful social organization, whose peculiarity is the admission of the wives, sisters and mothers of members to associate membership, the club being open to them at all times.

GOSPEL LIGHT SPREADING in CUBA

A JOLLY LOAD OF LITTLE "AMERICANOS"

IT is a pleasant thing to note that while the young Cuban republic is making substantial progress in self-government, the spiritual life of the people is not being neglected. Indeed, all along the line of the various Gospel movements throughout the island there are evidences of progress and encouragement. In less than a year, "El Faro Cristiano" Mission, at Madruga, Havana province, has more than doubled its force of workers. Director J. B. Wood, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as follows: "The Sunday School Union work, for which we are now the representatives in Cuba, consists of tract and Bible distribution, and the forming of Sabbath Schools throughout the country villages, etc.

"Then there are our reading rooms both in Madruga, and Jaruco. The support of these must some time be transferred to the towns, unless some spiritual Carnegie takes hold, and establishes them all over the island. We must drive out darkness with light, fill the people with good thoughts and evil thoughts will not take root easily. In our medical work among the poor, Miss Ketuvah A. Smith has become so interested that she hardly has time to rest. Certainly this branch of the work has been a blessing to many. She practices among the sick poor, and preaches the Gospel as she goes. The direct work of evangelization is our main occupation, and we are very thankful to say that the Cubans are joining heartily in introducing the Gospel to their friends.

"We believe the yuca plant is destined to be a vegetable of great value to Cuba, on account of its growing sale in the American market. It grows as a small tree or tall straggling bush, from six to ten feet high. The root is first boiled and can then be fried, giving it a crispness which is very inviting to the palate.

"You may ask how many of the little party assembled upon the old pony (shown in the photograph), are Americans. All, we believe, and Californians at that. Childhood is everywhere around us, and as we travel from house to house, doing our best to establish Sabbath Schools, we are happy to mix in with the people, big and little, enjoy their pleasures, help in their work, share their sorrows.

"Drunkenness, which is so prevalent in the United States, is hardy known in Cuba. Many would say 'banish it from our land, and it will be Paradise:' but Satan has other ways of getting in his work. There is very widespread trouble here, as the result of the old Spanish church system of extorting excessive marriage fees. Unconsecrated marriages have resulted in large families of mixed blood, the fathers, in many cases, unwilling to acknowledge their real responsibility, and to marry, take refuge in returning to Spain, dividing a portion of their fortune with their children here, and pensioning off the neglected mother. Such cases are coming up before us continually in this inland work. We pray that family life may, in the future, be on a sounder basis in Cuba. We were intensely gratified lately, on finding a very old lady, ninety years of age, who told us she had been redeemed some sixty years, and has 'known her Saviour all the time.' Her two daughters, both blind, seem happy Christians, and we have had some blessed cottage meetings in their home. They knew nothing of the worship of Mary.

"So far we have been able to accommodate all who have come to aid in the work of the 'El Faro Cristiano' Mission, and God grant that we always may. The work has already increased far beyond its present pecuniary resources; but we are willing to trust Him, who in the past has never failed us, and who will raise up friends so that the work may not suffer from lack of support in the future."

Faith in Prayer

HERE is a letter from one of our readers in Ohio. It is a simple, straightforward letter, such as we are always glad to receive, and as we believe that it expresses an idea which many other readers may feel, we print it below.

OAKDALE, O., May, 1903

I wish some of your readers would tell me through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—those that have asked and received of the Lord—if they asked in faith, believing they would receive some time, or some way in God's own time, or if they just asked, with the hope of receiving? Some will say, "they asked and trusted." Do they mean by the word "trust," faith that their desires will be granted, or does "trust" mean the same as "hope"? My mind has been very much perplexed over those two words, "faith" and "trust," and I would like to become enlightened. J. L.

There is a wide difference between Faith and Hope. Hope may doubt; Faith never will, for it is the confidence that He who has promised will be faithful to perform. Hope is human, and appeals to the natural man; Faith is divine, and appeals to our spiritual nature alone. It is developed in the soul through prayer more largely than through any other means. By prayer we come nearer to the Heavenly Father. And when the earnest soul pours out its petitions in Jesus' name, it quickly discovers that it has entered upon a spiritual path untrodden before, and which leads clear up to the Throne.

It is one of the sweet and mysterious surprises of the Christian religion to find that our prayers are heard and answered. We realize that some new power, not our own, is influencing our life, and that we must strive to attune that life to nobler and purer harmonies. We feel that God is training and developing our faith through prayer—that it grows by the spiritual exercise, and that the privilege of presenting our needs in Jesus' name, is, indeed, a very great one. In ancient royal courts, the presentation by a suppliant of a signet ring, given to him by a son of the monarch, procured for him whatsoever he desired of the King. So, when the prayers of the believer, uttered in faith, are hallowed with the name of Jesus, they win instant acceptance in the court of Heaven.

Faith is the essence of prayer; faith in Christ's promise and in the Father's willingness to honor the royal pledge: "That whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you." He who waits on God continually feels the power of the prayer of faith, and is amazed at that power, which comes of resting on the Saviour's assurance. A life of prayer is the ideal life for every Christian. Even if we pray amiss and plead for that which would be to our own hurt—though, with our imperfect understanding of his will and purpose, we may not comprehend it at the moment—he will set us right, and we will be brought to perceive in the loving denial, the wisest and best answer.

Pray in faith, in Christ's name, and never doubt that the answer will come. This is a part of that "mystery of godliness" at which the world may mock, and which the foolish cannot understand; but it will soon be clear to him who asks in faith, that "answered prayer" is a solid, potential, absolute fact in Christian life and experience. Thousands of our readers can attest the truth of this.

Sorrow Clearing the Vision

OUR life is too great to have its plan completed and its mystery explained within the narrow limits of this world. We must survey the horizon of eternity, if we would see the full unfolding of the economy under which we are placed, and but a very small part of which falls under our inspection here; if we would see "the end of the Lord, that he is very pitiful"—the end of all the paths by which he is leading us, and recognize that they are mercy and truth to them that fear him. And the more we are imprisoned by circumstances, the more we are limited by trouble, the better fitted are we to get such a view as that. It needs trouble in the soul to look beyond things temporal, to the things that are eternal; just as it needs the air to be saturated with latent vapor, in order to bring distant objects to view.

Travelers in Switzerland have observed that the Alps at Macon, are as completely hidden behind a veil of perfectly clear open sky as behind a heavy cloud; but that before a change of weather, Mont Blanc showed itself distinctly with its well-known snowy dome and dark aiguilles clear out against the sky a hundred miles away. So, in the spiritual world; sorrow makes the atmosphere of the soul transparent, and the things of eternity, often unseen when all is well, grow near and well defined and vivid, as if a panorama unrolled by angel hands before our mortal eyes.

A New British Policy

ONE of the most momentous changes proposed by any statesman in recent times has just been brought before the British Parliament. It is a proposal to unite Great Britain and her colonies in a fiscal bond against the outside world. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, who is at the head of the Colonial Department of the British Government, is the author of the scheme. No details of the measure have yet been announced, as Mr. Chamberlain frankly states that he desires, before formulating a plan, to challenge the opinion of Parliament on the principle involved. In brief, the object it is desired to attain, is to give the colonies a preferential position in the British markets. This can be done by levying a duty on certain imports received from foreign countries, when the same or similar goods can be supplied by the Colonies, which would be admitted at a lower rate, or duty free. Thus, wheat from Russia or the United States would be subject to duty, while wheat from Canada or Australia would be admitted on lower terms. Mr. Chamberlain admits that the increase in the cost of living which this system would involve in Great Britain, would fall most heavily on the working classes; but he contends that it would be accompanied by an increase of wages, though, so far, he has not explained how the one change would tend to produce the other. To outsiders, it would appear that increased wages would mean increased cost of production, which would place Great Britain at a disadvantage in the markets of the world. Until the details of Mr. Chamberlain's plan are definitely announced, no materials for judgment upon it exist; but the principle is distinctly a return to methods which, it was supposed, Great Britain had abandoned. The result of the adoption of the proposed policy would affect not only Great Britain, but this country, from which Great Britain last year bought goods to the value of $486,000,000, and Germany, and indeed all other countries which have commercial relations with Great Britain. Whether the increase of trade with the colonies would balance the loss sustained with other countries, no one can foresee; but it is evident that the experiment would be a most serious one, involving enormous disturbance of the world's commercial interests.

Laid-Up Goodness

GOD'S kind provision for men is not a mere benevolent impulse, a good-natured interposition in the moment of extremity. It is a purposed and prepared goodness—goodness laid up beforehand, kept in store, and calculated far in advance with reference to all the helplessness, and danger, and sorrow of human life, so that when the moment of necessity comes, we find it anticipated by a provision for it ready and waiting, like the corn which Joseph laid up in the barns of Egypt against the time of famine.

In Switzerland and Norway, the snow on the tops of the lofty mountains never melts, summer or winter. It remains and accumulates, and by its own weight it presses downward, and forms in the hollows those great streams of solid ice which we call glaciers. These glaciers move onward at a rate so slow that, one watching a whole day perceives little or no change. But at last they reach a point far below, where the air is so warm that the end of the icy mass melts, and forms rivers which flow to the sea. By this wonderful provision of nature, God lays up in store vast quantities of water upon the mountains, for the refreshment of the valleys and the plains at their foot. Without these, the moisture that fall upon the mountain tops would run off in raging torrents, scattering ruin over all the fields below.

The trouble with many of us is, that we are not willing to wait. We complain of God's plan of laying up his goodness for us. Why should it be kept so close, under lock and key, and doled out to us so slowly and carefully? But God's thoughts toward us are better than our own. The largest faith, the most enduring patience, the most conquering strength, the noblest sympathies, the most ineffable rest—these are among the treasures of his goodness which are laid up for us, not in hardness but in love, to be brought forth from period to period of life only by our living and working in harmony with his great laws.

Courage in Bereavement

ONE of the greatest temptations which assails a mourner, is to shun after a bereavement the accustomed haunts of the dear one who has gone. For example, a mother shuns the church she has always attended, because the dread of sitting in the familiar pew without the beloved daughter, assumes large proportions in her eyes. "I cannot enter the church yet," she says, "the thought of missing her is too terrible." She is missing her every day at home, but of that she does not think. The longer she puts off going to church the harder and more impossible becomes the act, and, in the end, she has to sever old ties and start anew. In the same category is the habit of shunning a home or a place where the lost loved ones were happy.

Friends, we have need of courage in the hour when death has swept bare the landscape of our life. We have need also of faith, a real and exalted faith, that takes hold of the invisible and believes that our dear ones are alive forevermore. We have need of cheerfulness, even in the hour of sorrow, that we may rise above it. We have need of great and strong unselfishness, that we may not let our sadness crush and wound the children, the invalids, the old, or our neighbors.

Never have we more need of communion with Christ than after a great and sore affliction.

Caution

A SUBSCRIBER IN IOWA writes that a man visited him recently, and asked him to purchase an Irish linen set at $15, and assured him that the money would be used to support an orphan in India. He exhibited a cutting from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as an endorsement of his scheme. We wish it to be clearly understood that the man is not an agent of ours; that we know nothing at all of him; and have never heard of any such method of raising money for the orphans of India. The police of any town visited by a man with such a proposal should investigate his case, and ascertain what becomes of the money intrusted to him. So far as this journal is concerned, all that it can do is to thus notify the public that it has no connection whatever with him or his business. The surest and best way of helping the orphans of India, is to send the money direct to this office, and we will at once put the sender in communication with a missionary in India, who will assign an orphan to him, and will keep him informed of the orphan's condition and progress. It is always imprudent to deal with strangers in such matters.

"Sacred Damascus"

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

OLDEST of old-world cities, Damascus occupies one of the most picturesque sites in Syria. The city itself has changed but little in the passing centuries. There are the temples, the ancient shrines, the cool and sparkling fountains, and all the charm which marked the place when it was the sole seat of civilization in Syria. In looking at the river Abana (now called the Barada), we are reminded of Naaman the leper, and his questioning of the Israelitish prophet's servant. South of the Abana is the river Awaj (the ancient Pharpar). City of the patriarchs, of Eleazar's mission and the loves of Isaac and Rebecca, of kings and conquerors, wars and festivals. City of the vision of Saul and of his blindness, as he was led along the "street called Straight," to the house of Christian shelter for the former persecutor of the Christians; city where he afterward recovered his eyesight. City famed through all time for its damascened weapons of steel, its figured silk damask cloths, its manufactures and merchandise, its orchards and its gardens, the pride of the East.

Notwithstanding all the ravages of time, the devastation of numberless wars, and the temporary obliteration of the city by Timur the Tartar, Damascus to-day is beautiful, even in its decay. Its population is almost wholly Mohammedan. Its bazaars are among the best to be found anywhere in the East. Every trade has its own quarter, and all the costumes and customs of Asia are there. The scene shown on the cover page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one that is familiar in Damascus, where the merchants in the bazaars, the purchasers, and even the visitors from distant lands, patronize the outdoor sellers of sherbet, or sweet cakes, or refreshing coffee.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Anarchy in the Balkans

NEWS from the Balkan regions shows that massacre and pillage prevail throughout a large and thickly populated area. While Turkish troops brutally murder men, women and children, and burn whole villages; the Macedonians, on their side, attack Mohammedans and commit similar ruthless outrages. Occasionally the forces meet, and then there is a sanguinary battle. On May 21, such a conflict occurred at Smardesh near Monastir. The battle lasted thirty hours and involved a terrible slaughter. The Macedonians had possession of a quantity of dynamite, and, during the firing, a Turkish shell fell upon it, causing it to explode. At least 150 Macedonians were blown to pieces. The village of Banitzi was totally destroyed on the following day by the Turks, and the inhabitants fled, homeless and penniless, to other villages. In the districts of Kitchevo and Nevrokop, the Turks are making a scene of utter desolation. Villages are blockaded and preparations are being made to burn them. The inhabitants are fleeing, but apparently know not where to go. The Turkish contention that Bulgaria is taking active part in the rising appears to be well-grounded. The Bulgarian Government professes to hold aloof, but many of the prisoners captured by the Turks are undoubtedly Bulgarians, and many of the officers of the Macedonian troops are of the same nationality. The Turks are now arresting male Bulgarians wherever they are found on Turkish territory. The tension between the two governments increases daily. Turkey, however, hesitates to declare war, knowing well that Austria and Russia would not allow Bulgaria to be crushed by her powerful foe. Meanwhile the misery continues, and, unhappily, those who suffer most are not the men who are fighting, but the women and children who are homeless and starving. Many of them are declaring, as did the persecuted people of old:

They that be slain of the sword are better than they that are slain with hunger (Lam. 4:9).

In the Far North

The brief reports of the wonderful exploration led by the Duke of the Abruzzi, which were published soon after his return from the Arctic regions, have now been supplemented by the publication of a book fully describing the perilous journey. It is now possible to realize some of the thrilling situations in which the explorers were placed. One of the most serious was the discovery, on the edge of winter, that the Polar Star, on which the voyage had been made and was the only means by which the expedition could return home, had been severely damaged by the ice. She was leaking badly, and the Duke ordered his men ashore. They built huts on the land, a picture of which, taken by moonlight, appears on this page. The men were at once set to repair their vessel. "Under the strong pressure of the ice against the bow the ship had backed about ninety feet, and had risen at the same time on the ice, where she remained, with her bow out of the water, heeling over about twenty degrees to the left. Great slabs of ice had been raised against her side and stern while she was making her way through them. At the bow all the rigging of the foremast had broken loose, and on the right side of the ship, which was exposed from the middle to the bow, when she heeled over, the outer planks of greenheart were seen to have been driven in to a depth of two and a half or three and a quarter inches for a length of eighteen or twenty feet, so much so that a hand could be passed between them." All hands worked resolutely on repairs, and eventually the vessel was made again seaworthy. They rested until spring, and then the sledge party set out on their journey farther north, leaving a small number in charge of the huts and the ship. As our readers know, the party succeeded in reaching nearer the Pole than any previous explorers, and, after hairbreadth escapes, returned to the huts and voyaged home in safety. The intrepid explorers have nobly served the cause of science and deserve all the honor they are receiving. It is well that in this age, that in some respects is sordid, men can be found willing to imperil their lives for scientific interests. Still better is it that the cause of Christ enlists such men, who by their lives prove that they have the Apostolic spirit:

Neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy and the ministry which I have received (Acts 20:24).

Massacre by Automobile

The shocking disasters which resulted from the recent automobile race from Paris to Madrid, show that the legislation in this country restricting speed, severely as it has been criticized, is amply justified. The race was begun on Sunday, May 24, with the customary French disregard for the sanctity of the day. There were 314 entries of machines, of various powers. The distance to be covered was 712 miles, divided into three stages. From Paris to Bordeaux, 243 miles; Bordeaux to Vittoria, 208 miles; Vittoria to Madrid, 261 miles. Before noon on Sunday, reports of accidents began to arrive. In spite of the fact that six thousand soldiers and four thousand police had been stationed at intervals along the roads, to keep the course clear, three persons were run over and killed and several others injured. Three of the automobilists were also killed, and seven so severely injured that their lives were despaired of. In some parts of the journey the speed of the leading machines had been eighty-eight miles an hour, and the whole journey, including the time lost at places where slowing down was compulsory, was done by one of the leaders at an average speed of forty-eight miles an hour. It is not surprising that vehicles driven at such speed, not on rails carefully laid, but upon the ordinary highway, should have come to grief. The disasters were no sooner known to the French Government than an order was issued stopping the race. There was, therefore, no racing done beyond Bordeaux. Probably some legislation will follow in both countries restricting speed. This is necessary, not so much for the sake of the automobilists themselves, whose death or injury is their own risk, but for the sake of others, whose right to the safe use of the highways ought to be guaranteed. No man is justified in taking a pastime that imperils the lives of others. Does it compare in the same [illegible] would in any way [illegible] consume the automobile, but it [illegible] effect. THE CHRISTIAN'S WEAPON*

Apostolic Directions for the Use of the Spiritual Sword

HOW many have found the Word of God to be such a sword as the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews describes! To the man parleying with temptation, to the man anxious to be counted among God's children, yet having some one precious sin dear to him as a right hand or a right eye, that sword has gone home, piercing in very deed "to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit." It is a double-edged sword, having a function for self-application, as well as for use against the enemy. An impression prevails that in some degree Christianity has lowered the standard of righteousness. It did lower the standard of formal and outward observance, but no Jew ever lived under so high a standard of inner and vital righteousness. The Jew could pass muster if in his life there was no overt act of transgression; but the Christian finds the sword penetrating below conduct. It reaches to "the thoughts and intents of the heart," and menaces the life of him who has evil in his heart, which he does not suffer to manifest itself in his life. It is not now enough that the Christian's life be blameless; he is required to love truth and to serve God with full purpose of heart. The sword must slay all within him that opposes itself to God's will and all that hinders his growth in grace.

In the panoply of the Christian, the Word of God is the weapon of aggression. Having served its purpose in his own nature, it is to be used for attack and defence. How well it serves its purpose! In his hour of temptation, our Lord himself did not disdain to use it. "It is written," was a phrase which he used effectually on the adversary. There was no argument, no compromise. The written word was sufficient for him. That ended all suggestions. In that method of warfare Christ furnished us with an example. Not for us is it to enquire the why and wherefore. It suffices that it is written. Do we find a warning? let us heed it. Do we find a command? let us obey it. Do we find a promise? let us grasp it. It is only by warfare that we maintain our standing, only by active hostility that we can hope to propagate our faith and overcome the power of evil. In all our fight, the effective weapon is the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

LOYALTY*

Be Loyal to the King and the Kingdo

FROM the American Revision of th Book of Job, we get a differe version of the passage associate with the Topic, from that give by the Authorized Version. It read "Behold he will slay me; I have no hope That is doubtless the correct renderin and one naturally wonders how such passage illustrates the Topic: "Be loy to the King and the Kingdom." Th probable explanation is that the list wa prepared by some person, who did n know that a Revision of the Bible ha been made. There are, however, in othe parts of the Bible, many passages whic show the duty of loyalty and the reward which come from such loyalty.

It is a remarkable feature of Christ mission that one so humble and so una suming in his general deportment as h should have made claims so exalted. H consistently declared himself a king, an at the last, when such a claim was th most fatal he could make before the t bunal of the Roman Governor, he wou not abate it one jot. He was a King, h insisted upon his regal nature and he d manded of his followers personal all giance. At this day we are realizing, our fathers never did, how much th means. We are thinking less of cree and doctrines than of loyalty to Chris We can be loyal subjects of the Gover ment under which we live; indeed, we a enjoined to be such; but if the laws that Government ever came into oppo tion to the laws of Christ and his kingdo there is no doubt as to what would be o duty. That loyalty is something high than citizenship, for it is the loyalty soul. Time and again men have had th loyalty challenged, and when they kn that the penalty of avowing it would death, they have proved true. Why shou they not? He laid down his life rath than abandon us; we also ought to be tr to him. We owe to him the regenerati of our souls; we owe to him the power resist evil and all our hopes of a glorio immortality; surely it is not too much require of us that rather than abjure o allegiance we should die. In our land a time no such alternative is forced upon u but sometimes we have to face contume and ridicule, and not infrequently even th has proved a test too severe for our co age. But the test is inflexible. So esse tial did Christ regard it, that he sai "Whosoever is ashamed of me, of h will I be ashamed when I come."

SELLING THEIR CHILDREN FOR BREAD

The Terrible Straits of the Famir Stricken Natives in Kwangsi, Chi

A FEW weeks ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a cable message from United States Consul-General McWade at Canton, China, in which that official made appeal in behalf of the people in the interior of Kwangsi province, who were suffering from famine. In response to that appeal, the proprietor of this journal forwarded by cable through our State Department in Washington, $5,000 for relief work in the province.

Consul-General McWade has now forwarded to the State Department a detailed report of the situation in Kwangsi, a copy of which has been furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the courtesy of Assistant Secretary of State, Hon. Francis B. Loomis. It is clear, from this official report, that China's famine is very far from being over. It has now traveled from one end of the vast empire to the other, and the suffering in Kwangsi, though perhaps less widespread than that in Shensi and other northern provinces thus far, is still of a character to awaken the sympathy of all who have been observant of China's affliction during the last three years. Consul-General McWade writes:

CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, Canton, China,
April 7, 1903.

Honorable Francis B. Loomis,
Assistant Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

SIR:—In further continuation of my No. 11, concerning conditions in Kwangsi, I have the honor to report as follows:

On April 3, 1903, I cabled to the Department as follows, duplicating my despatch to Minister Conger at Peking:

"Secretary of State, Washington.

"Famine increasing Kwangsi, starving parents selling children small sums. I appeal charitable help. McWADE."

Reliable information from American missionaries and native sources having come to me from Kwai Ping, Wuchow, and other places in Kwangsi, that the destitution and consequent suffering in certain parts of that province were appalling, and that, in their desperate condition, the heads of families were selling their children and women for from $2 each to $5 each, I sent you the foregoing despatch. Frequent appeals have been made to me for help, and I am frank to say, so heartrending were they, that I have contributed far beyond my means. I would give more if I had it.

One missionary writes me:

The famine is greatly increasing in severity and thousands are starving. It is very sad to see the poor, thin, sallow creatures just starving to death. Do you think any of the people here or at home would be willing to send some help? Could you not bring the matter before the foreigners and natives also and see if something cannot be done? Boys, girls, and women are sold for $2, $3, $5, $8, $10, and so many are offered, that purchasers are difficult to find. Whole families are actually starving to death. One village has lost two hundred persons already. Unless something is done soon thousands and thousands will starve to death.

The Rev. John E. Fee, of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, writes:

Many can hardly walk. Two days ago a man got a little rice from us, and on the next evening I saw him dead, lying in an old shed. This morning I saw one who received a little thick gruel yesterday lying dead by the river side. He probably fell, as it was rainy and slippery, and then could not get up, and therefore just lay there in the wet and died. Some faces haunt us day and night.

An American missionary lady writes:

We are feeding on an average of 3,600 daily, and the recipients live almost entirely on what they get from us. To each we give daily a quart of hot, thick chuk (congee, i.e., rice boiled with water), or four ounces: Chinese boiled rice. God has enabled us to continue this daily distribution of food through charitable contributions. The scenes baffle all description. The gentry have begun giving three ounces of rice per day to needy ones residing in the city, but those outside have no part in it.

Another American missionary writes:

From Ping Nam on the east to Nanning on the west, an area about three hundred miles in length, and varying in width, there has for three successive seasons been no harvest. Well-to-do people are reduced to poverty, and the poor are starving to death. Household goods, farming implements, clothing, cattle, and in many cases, women and children, have been sold, and nothing remains for some but to die of hunger. For a long time we have been giving a little help to needy ones, in a quiet way, but for over three weeks we have had a systematic distribution of food, once a day. When the numbers who came outgrew our Mission Chapel, the officials granted the use of the Emperor's temple. Tickets are given to apparently needy persons, as they leave the building, in exchange for which each gets a quart of thick rice gruel or four ounces of rice, as they pass through the outside gate. For three weeks ending March 26, the average number fed per day, has been 1,540, and the largest number any day, was 3,047. Although these crowds have been large, yet the people have been quiet, orderly, and grateful for the help received. Whole families are subsisting on a few ounces of rice a day or on roots, herbs and leaves gathered in the fields or on the mountains. In our relief work, which has been confined to this city and the immediate vicinity, we have had the support of the foreign residents in Wuchow, all the missionaries in the province, and the Chinese Christians.

Many are dying daily, and unless more aid reaches us at an early date, even those whose lives we have been enabled to save, will succumb. We therefore send you these few facts, hoping they may appeal to some who will contribute towards the help of this perishing people, and tide them over until the hoped-for harvest in July.

My last communication is from the Rev. Dr. Thomas McCloy, of the American Southern Baptist Convention Mission. It is as follows:

WUCHOW, April 4, 190
DEAR CONSUL GENERAL:—The famine is severely felt in the districts of Kwai Yun, Kw Ping and Ping Nam. Women and children these districts are being sold quite openly, a many daily pass through Wuchow on their way Canton. Mr. Fee, at Kwai Ping, is daily giv congee to a large crowd of people. We would glad if something more could be done for them; our funds are small. THOS. McCLO

Several of the missionaries are under t impression that if there is a good rice cr towards the end of July, the destitution a suffering will be nearly at an end in the fa ine-stricken province. My conviction, ho ever, is—and it is shared by many of t "gentries" and old missionaries—that unl the rice and other crops of July, August a September are plentiful, the famine will o be measurably alleviated. A repetition last year's flood on the West River, wh whole villages on its bank were swept aw and the crops wholly destroyed, will w such havoc as will require abundant cr and ample prosperity for fifty years to cor before the people can entirely recuperate. it is, several decades of prosperity m elapse before they can experience a visi and material recovery.

It was out of a troubled heart, saddened the sufferings of these starving and desper people, and desirous of doing something help them in their terrible distress, that I pended to my official dispatch the words, appeal charitable help."

The natives here feel that Americans ha come amongst them for their and our mut benefit, and not as their enemy or to se any of their lands under any specious other pretexts. I desire to emphasize th feeling by means of the great charity of people at home, who, in their earnest effo to relieve the needy and distressed, know religion, no creed, no race, no nation. Wh they have done for the starving in Irela and in Russia, I earnestly hope they will for the starving in Kwangsi, China.

SOME OF OUR LITTLE PRIZE-WINNERS

NOW that the approach of the season of outing has made it advisable to discontinue, for a time at least, the Puzzle Department, which has afforded so much pleasure to our young readers during the winter and spring months, we are receiving many letters from those who have taken part in the competition. We quote briefly from some of these communications, which show how keenly the young folks enjoyed the problems we set them to solve, and how even the older heads occasionally took a part in the work when any specially knotty subject came up in the competition.

Ruth B. Jenkins. Raymond Hopkins. Everett M. Vannah. Rose L. Hickey.

Mary Edick. Marian Hall. Rosa A. Goldberg. Rose Hickey.

Miss Mary Hardie of Cedar Point, Kan., writes: "You are so kind to little children, I love you. I have been saving up my money to send a little girl to the country."——"I know you like little children," writes Robert Huffman, St. Paris, O.——"The beautiful book prize received. I am very proud and grateful, and intend to show it by being a good girl and learning all I can about the Bible. I am sure that will please you." This from little Miss Gertrude Irwin, Smith's Fork, Tenn.——"I shall always keep the nice prize as a reminder of a kind friend's interest in children, and it will be as a bright spot in my memory," writes a particularly clever little girl, Miss Winifred Burdick, W. Salem, Ore.——"It is very good of you to give so much of your time to the little folks. The book you sent me is just right, and I thank you many times for it," writes Carl Smith, Cleveland, O.——"I have learned a great many things looking for the answers to the puzzles. I will always remember them, especially the ones in which I made mistakes," naively observes Addie Robbins, Hillsdale, Mich.——"You can't imagine what a proud girl I was when I received my prize book of Recitations. You couldn't have pleased me better in your selection;" so writes Ethel M. Williams, W. Va.——"The beautiful book, Quiet Secretaries, received. I today you to Psalm 96 3, 'That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.'" This from little Edna Horn of Dexter, Mich.——"We love the dear old Creator's Heart more, if possible, than ever, since you have given us 'The Children's Heart.' I am sure you will be blessed for your goodness to all." This is the sentiment of little Miss Louise Glaze, Elkton, Tenn.

Letters with kind and loving expressions like the foregoing have been received from Helen Kilder, Bluffton, O.; Herman Wengand, Brodhagen, Ont., Can.; Dorothy Farnsworth, Westport, N. Y.; Edna Simmons, Fayetteville, Ark.; Sylvan Bondurant, Trentville, Tenn.; Earl V. White, Marshall, Wis.; Harve Mitchell, Cleo, Tenn.; Miriam L. Voltz, New Orleans, La.; Hope L. Fordham, New York; Almira Gladys Frink, Norwich, Conn.; Marion C. Bidwell, Stockbridge, Mass.; Jayson S. Swartz, Waukesha, Wis., and others, all of those mentioned being young folks who have received Consolation Prizes in the Puzzle Competition.

Our readers will no doubt be interested in seeing the faces of these bright young people, who have distinguished themselves in the competition. We have therefore presented on this page the portraits of the winners of "first prizes."

In our issue of Dec. 10, 1902, Grace C. Logan, Pennsylvania, and Paul E. Hubble, Virginia, were the little first of the prize winners. Mary Edick, Ohio, and Charlie Anstis, Minnesota, were successful in winning the two first prizes in our puzzles of Dec. 17, 1902. In competition No. 3, Rosa Goldberg, Ontario, Can., won the first prize for the best answer to "Curious Questions." David Kroeber, Georgia, received a watch, and also Grace L. Colwell, New York, for the best answers received to the puzzles in our issue of Dec. 31, 1902. Walter G. Hill, Massachusetts, won a watch in the "Picture Puzzle" contest for Jan. 7, 1903, and Flossie De Jong, Michigan, for the best answer to "Curious Questions" of same date.

Wild Animals I Have Known, was won by Raymond Hopkins, Rhode Island, for "Curious Questions" in issue of Jan. 14, 1903. Everett Vannah, Maine, and Philip Whitcomb, Kansas, were the successful competitors in the contests of Jan. 21, 1903. A watch was awarded to Rose Hickey, Arizona, for sending the best answers to "Curious Questions" of Jan. 28, 1903, and one also to Alma Lundberg, Wisconsin, for "Curious Questions" in issue of Feb. 4, 1903. TRAINING FOR SOUL-WINNERS

EDGAR P. ELLYSON MRS. EMILY ELLYSON

AMONG the many theological seminaries that are springing up in the Middle West, one of the most active is the Christian Workers Training School, at Marshalltown, Iowa. The school was started five years ago by Mr. Edgar P. Ellyson, in the village of Le Grand, but after two years it was moved to Marshalltown, in order that the students might have an opportunity to do active Christian work. The house which was first rented for the use of the classes, was, at the end of two seasons, bought outright. Already a new building has become a necessity for the future development of the work.

This institution for the up-building of the cause of Christ in fitting pastors, evangelists, and missionaries to go out into their respective fields, was attended during the last season by fifty students.

Mr. Ellyson is a member of the Friends Church, but students from the M. E., M. P., Evangelical and Presbyterian Churches, avail themselves of the blessed opportunity of studying the Word under his personal teaching.

The work is one of faith, and is supported by voluntary contributions. Any reader desiring further information, may address Mr. Edgar P. Ellyson, 802 W. Main street, Marshalltown, Iowa, who will gladly answer all inquiries concerning the Training Institute and its work.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Friend, Gloucester, Mass.: "Some time ago I prayed earnestly for the conversion of a friend. The answer has come. It is indeed true, that God both hears and answers prayer."

Reader, Crandall, Tex.: "I have had answer to prayer in regard to a dear one, for whom I have prayed for several years. God always answers prayer when it is best for us."

J. L. M., Virginia: "At one time a great sorrow hung over my home. I prayed to my dear Father to help, when I could see no way out, and he heard and answered. And since then I have been encouraged to take many other troubles to him."

E. R., Storm Lake: "I know that God is a prayer-hearing and answering God. In two particular instances has he directly answered my prayers. Each time I promised him I would tell the world, and I now redeem that promise."

S. A. R., Bridgeport, Pa.: "My cross seemed greater than I could bear. I prayed, and my prayer was answered. I wish others could find the same consolation in taking everything to God in prayer."

Mrs. J. H. R., Lincoln Falls, Pa.: "I want to acknowledge the many answers to prayer I have received. God has been very merciful. I have many reasons for special thanksgiving."

H. V. W., Lafayette, Ind.: "For four years I have prayed constantly to either see or to hear, in some way, from a loved one. The Father heard me, and my loved one was brought to me. I shall never doubt that our Father hears all our feeble prayers, and will answer them in due time."

The Book for Life and Death ❋ Paul's Charge to Timothy

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 21
II. TIMOTHY 3: 14 TO 4: 8

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT:
THERE IS LAID UP FOR ME A CROWN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS—II. TIM. 4: 8

THE Apostle Paul is face to face with death in a dungeon prison of Rome. He is fully aware that his end is near, for he says, "The time of my departure is at hand." We note that five years have passed since he came as a prisoner to Rome, and we ask him where he spent that time? He replies, "During the first two years of my Roman imprisonment I was permitted to dwell in my own hired home. At the end of that time, I was brought to trial, and being acquitted, was set free. I proceeded to carry out my long cherished desire to preach the Gospel again in Asia. En route I paused in Macedonia, that I might strengthen my spiritual children there. I then preached in Asia Minor for about a year's time, after which I went to Spain, in fulfilment of another long cherished plan. There I remained about two years, preaching mostly in seacoast cities. Then I went to Ephesus for a short season, contrary to my former expectation that I should not again see the faces of my friends there. But alas! that of which I had warned the elders had come to pass, in that grievous wolves, in the form of false teachers, had preyed upon the flock of Christ. I placed Timothy in charge of the church, having written him in a letter (the First Epistle to Timothy), most explicit directions about dealing with these false teachers. From Ephesus I came to Crete, and after spending some little time there, left Titus in charge of the churches of that region, and journeyed so far north as Nicopolis, on the shore of the Ionian Sea.

"There I hoped to spend the winter preaching the Gospel, but I was suddenly arrested by the magistrates of Nicopolis, and sent to Rome, on the charge of having incited the Christians to the burning of Rome. There had just occurred a most destructive conflagration, undoubtedly started by Nero himself, or at his command. But desiring to shield himself, he had charged the crime upon the Christians. I have no doubt, however, that my arrest in Nicopolis was instigated by Jews who were offended because of my preaching that Jesus is the true Messiah. Upon reaching Rome I was put into a dungeon prison called the Mammertine, where I now await my execution. It is damp and chill, and I have written to Timothy to bring me my cloak, which I left at Troas, and also some of my books and manuscripts. I would see his beloved face once more. My faithful friend Luke often comes to my prison, and Onesiphorus has often refreshed me."

The second letter to Timothy was the last one ever written by the Apostle Paul. And we are privileged to know its contents. There is little in it that refers to the personal discomfort of Paul. On the contrary, he refers to his approaching death, which he undoubtedly knew would come through beheading, as a coronation, at which he would receive a crown that fadeth not away. "I am ready," he said, with no fear about his fate. It was while looking death in the face that he wrote this letter to Timothy, calling upon Timothy to be instant in season and out of season in teaching the Word of God, which he had learned even in childhood from his mother, Eunice, and his grandmother, Lois, and later had come to appreciate manfully through his personal knowledge of Christ. Paul points out to Timothy the way in which he may make the Bible profitable to others.

Did Timothy receive the letter in time to reach Paul while he was yet alive? The Bible does not tell us, but there is some ground for believing that Timothy did go to Rome and for a time actually shared Paul's imprisonment. But it could only have been for a short season, as the letter was sent in March, and Timothy could hardly have reached Rome before May, and Paul's execution must have occurred early in June. On the spot where he was beheaded stands to-day "St. Paul's Church," a memorial of his victory on the very ground where he seemed to have been defeated. He himself belongs in the list of victors who were "slain by the sword" (Heb. 11:37).

Illustration and Application

From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures. Artists delight to set childhood and age side by side. Sometimes it is grandmother and the baby. In one beautiful picture it is "Sweet Sixteen and Sweet Sixty." So here we have "Paul the aged" reminding Timothy of his childhood, and for childhood and age alike presenting the Bible as a faithful counselor. The Bible is indeed the Book for youth and age, for joy and sorrow, for life and death.

Three words Paul uses in speaking to Timothy of the Bible: "learned," "assured," "continue." What Timothy had "learned" from his mother and grandmother, and from Paul, he had "assured" himself of by a Christian experience, and now he was urged to "continue," which implied both to hold fast and progress. So in Sunday School let it not be forgotten that lessons are not only to be learned, but also to be lived. What are we going to do with this lesson? Shall it not be carried home in increased Bible reading, with a view to right living and holy dying?

Wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Between two commendations of the Bible Paul sets the living Word, Jesus Christ. No thing, no creed, not even the Bible, should become the centre of our religion. The living Christ must be its central sun. "Ye search the Scriptures," said Jesus to the Jews, "because ye think in them ye have eternal life, but they are they that testify of me, and ye will not come unto me that ye may have life." Our death will be right without anxious thought of it, if only we seek and find in Christ true life. As in the Egyptian religion, so in former centuries, in Christian homes and hearts also there was relatively too much thought of death and the future life, and too little of one's duty to help make a "better country," and a "better world" here and now. We have swung to another extreme, where there is too little thought of death and the future life, but it is well that the chief end of religion is now seen to be not to "save a soul in heaven," but to save the whole man, and the whole community here and now, by living Christlike, Christ-filled lives. This is true wisdom, which is a very different thing from theoretic learning.

Wisdom means capacity to apply knowledge to life, to one's own salvation and the salvation of the race. In Timothy's very childhood he was "wise unto salvation," but alas, the opposite may be true, that a child may be unwise to his destruction. A child was running along through a crowded thoroughfare, with an apple clutched in her little hands. The apple slipped, and went rolling down the street. Instantly the child darted into the road, forgetting everything except the precious apple. On it rolled into the midst of the carts and carriages, the little child pursuing it, right under the very feet of the horses. It was all so sudden, so unexpected. The driver could do nothing, and in an instant the child lay crushed to death beneath the wheels, the apple beside her. She lost her life for an apple. So there are boys so absorbed in amusements that they are imperiling—some of them losing—their souls for a game. They must follow their sport whatever evil associations it takes them into, whatever duties they neglect.

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God. Inspiration means such a divine superintendence of the human writers of the Bible as led them, without destroying their originality, to use only such literary matter as would be profitable and omit all that would be false. That all Scripture has actually proved "profitable" for conviction, for conversion, for Christian culture, unlike any other book of the same age or any other of any age not based upon it, is itself one of the best proofs that the Bible is divine. Paul gives us a bunch of keys to unlock the treasures to which every Bible page is a door. The ring is "All Scripture is profitable," and the keys are the threefold question we ask at every page, and never in vain, "How has this Scripture proved profitable for conviction? Or for conversion? Or for Christian culture?" Does any one think the long lists of names in the Bible, for example, too unimportant for God to have anything to do with their inclusion in the Bible? Our doubts are removed when we read the story we have told before of a man converted by hearing the Genesis list read in church with the oft-recurring words after each name, "and he died," which reminded this hearer that this would some day be said of him, and that he was not ready to die, which led him to seek the life which is proof against death. There is not a page of the Bible which has not helped men to nobler living. The Bible's matchless influence on men and nations is but one of many proofs of its inspiration, but it is enough.

I have fought a good fight. In Trafalgar Square, London, stands a statue of a Christian soldier, Gen. Gordon. He stands in his patrol jacket, holding no weapon, but only the rattan cane he carried in all his Chinese battles, and under one elbow he holds the Bible he so prized and exemplified. But Paul reminds us men may be heroic soldiers without going to war. Preachers, teachers, editors—parents most of all—should show the young that they may be heroes without fighting. Paul seemed to be defeated, but was really a victor.

Let those who have failed take courage,
Though the enemy seems to have won,
Though his ranks are strong, if in the wrong
The battle is not yet done:
For sure as the morning follows
The darkest hour of the night,
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all-long suffering and teaching. Patient but fearless teaching is what is here commanded, and although no martyr fires await such teaching to-day, there are other fires which call for all our courage, for still is it true that many "will not endure sound doctrine, "especially when it condemns their business or their pleasures. "Watch," "endure," are still needed exhortations for teachers.

I have finished my course. "The crowds of spectators were watching almost breathlessly for the end of the race. Who would win? Another moment and a shout of triumph would go up; each man wanted that shout to be in his honor. They are nearing the goal, strength is failing, breath comes thick and short—one last effort, and a cyclist shoots into the goal—victorious! Deafening cheers rise from the excited crowd. Men strain their eyes to see who is the winner, but he does not hear the shouts, he does not see the eager faces. Something is wrong. He lies on the ground motionless. Someone calls for a doctor, but when they examine his heart, they find it has stopped beating. It must have stopped a few seconds before he reached the goal, but the bicycle was carrying the rider at such a speed that it brought him in first to the winning-post. The race was won by a dead man! What profit was it to him that he had gained the prize and lost his life? 'What a terrible thing,' someone says, 'to gain the prize at the loss of his life!' What a still more terrible thing to gain the prize at the loss of a soul; to be so absorbed in the search for worldly fame, worldly honor, in the race for worldly distinction, in the struggle for worldly riches, that there is no time to take care of the soul, until neglected, uncared-for, it is finally lost."

In contrast, let us recall how gladly Paul, wearied with his long, hard journey, was glad to say: "I have finished my course." He had walked with God, like Enoch, and a child's sweet version of Enoch's story fits Paul's as well—may it fit ours also A little child went home from Sunday School, and the mother said: "Tell me what you learned at school?" And she said: "Don't you know, mother, we have been hearing about a man who used to go for walks with God. His name was Enoch. One day they went for an extra long walk, and they walked on and on, until God said to Enoch: 'You are a long way from home; you had better just come in and stay.'" It will help us to appreciate how dying Paul rested, as on a pillow, upon the promises of God, to recall the beautiful monument erected in St. Thomas Church, on the Isle of Wight, by Queen Victoria, to the memory of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I., who was held as a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle after her father had been beheaded, and was found dead one Sunday morning with her head pillowed on the open Bible at the words, "Come unto me and I will give you rest."

A BEAUTIFUL LIFE

THERE was there more perfect devotion than that existing between the missionary Mr. Devine, and his daughter Helen. Some said it was because the mother had died shortly after the birth of the daughter, and that since then Helen had grown to fill both places in the father's heart. Be that as it may, it was beautiful to see them together, th their solicitous interest and care for each other; e young girl, budding into womanhood, and the man, w somewhat past the prime of life, with hair heavily eaked with gray.

The natives used to look at them in wonderment, Mr. evine was a foreign missionary, and the lesson their ily lives taught was not the least of the good they ac- mplished. One day Mr. Devine was called a hun- ed miles from home to officiate at the funeral of a tive Christian, but as he was often obliged to take ese trips in connection with his work, and always re- rned safely, but little stress was laid upon the absence.

"I shall be absent three days, Helen," he said, and they urted with tenderest words affection. On the eve of s absence Helen was taken olently ill, a physician some enty miles away was sent r, and friendly ones min- tered to her wants, until it as announced that the dis- se assumed a most ma- gnant form, after which e old servant took entire harge, and worked untir- gly over her. There was ut a shadow of hope from e beginning, and twenty- our hours later, the fair oung girl, beautiful in youth, losed her eyes on scenes of is life, to enter into the aradise of God. By order he body was quickly placed way, and a mound on the ide of the hill marked the esting spot.

Later, when Mr. Devine eturned, he was met on the row of the hill by crowds of atives, who followed him nournfully to his home. When he asked them the ause of their grief, they re- mained silent, but as many of their customs were pecu- iar, he thought not that it ad any personal applica- ion, but that something had appened among themselves which was disturbing them. "I'll find out later," he thought, "and minister what comfort I can." Upon reach- ing his own home, his anxiety was intensified by meeting his old servant, weeping, up- on the threshold. There seemed but one thing which could cause such action.

"Hulda," he cried, "is Helen dead?" The woman fell on her knees at his feet, weeping anew.

"She was the Lord's, and has returned unto him, blessed be his name."

Then he entered into his study, and was seen no more for many hours, and no one knew of the communion he had with his God, but all who afterward came in contact with his life, realized the nearness and presence of the Holy Spirit.

The life went on, apparently the same, if anything there was a touch more of tenderness and love in his dealings with others. He was never too weary or heavy laden to perform work for his Master. If he showed traces of suffering, it was when he was alone with the Great Healer of wounds.

"Our missionary is working too hard," they said; but still he went on, performing with his might whatever his hand found to do.

There came a day when he was not in his accustomed place, and hundreds flocked to his door inquiring the cause.

"He is very ill," Hulda said, her body quivering with fear and emotion.

So he lay, his life gradually nearing its close, his hands restfully folded for the first time in many years, and his eyes shining with a peculiar lustre. A few hours before the end came he fixed them on the faithful, never-tiring servant.

"Hulda, I have had a most beautiful dream," he said. "I had been a thousand years in heaven, and was feasting my eyes still on the Saviour of mankind. Then a harp, more beautiful than any other was tuned close beside me, and turning my eyes from the face of the Divine One, I saw Helen, my Helen, glorified."

The lips closed in death, and the beautiful life, lived in Christlife service, was ended.

But its influence for good still lived and dwelt in the hearts of generations untold, but only God can measure the infinite good accomplished by this beautiful life!

Guests and Guest-Rooms

A neat and tidy hostess is often much annoyed by the carelessness of a guest who keeps her room in dire confusion. Young women are apt to throw their things about till the pretty guest-chamber, so attractive on their arrival, looks as if a cyclone had struck it. Shoes here, hats there, nothing where it ought to be. Everything misplaced. One of the marks of a really agreeable guest is that she keeps her room in order. If there is no servant in the house, or if there is only a single maid, the guest should make her bed, and thus minimize the labors of the hostess. At times, too, a guest should remain in her room. Most families enjoy being sometimes alone, and a guest who requires to be amused and entertained from morning until night, is rather too much of a tax.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—GRETCHEN. Daisies will fitly adorn the rooms for an early summer wedding.

—DIMPLE. Ice cream may be eaten with fork or spoon, as one prefers.

—N. C. D. Your ideas on the training of children are excellent. I wish they everywhere prevailed.

—SUBSCRIBER. Engaged people usually settle such questions as you ask, for themselves. But they should beware of too great familiarity.

—ELOISE. Return first calls within a week if possible. A card left at your door in your absence is a call's equivalent and must be returned promptly.

—LOUISE AND ALETTA. You cannot both marry the same man. As his preference is shown for the elder sister, the younger must withdraw from the field.

—REGRET. You misunderstood the article. Nobody has a higher respect for, and opinion of, the useful unmarried women, who form most valuable members of every community, than has Aunt Prudence.

ENTER INTO THY CLOSET

A LITTLE while at its morning,
Ere yet the day begins,
To seek the Father's blessing,
To gain the strength that wins
The victory in battle,
To be pardoned for our sins.

A little while in the evening,
To thank the Friend whose care
Has been around us ever
And kept them every snare!
To leave the world behind us,
And seek the mansions fair.

Where God, the Father, keepeth
His children ever nigh,
Each little one before Him
Safe underneath the sky,
Because both earth and heaven,
Are ever in his eye.—CLELIA WANDA LEIGH.

Common Salt

The following selection, from an exchange, is so pertinent that we pass it along. Everybody has salt in the pantry, and nobody keeps house without it. But few of us realize how very useful just common salt may be, in an emergency:

Many and various are the remedial uses to which it may be put, and the free use of salt goes far to preserving health in the home. As a conditioner, common salt may be relied on. By its judicious use the teeth are kept white, the gums hard and the breath sweet. When the gums are spongy, the mouth should be washed out twice a day with salt and water. Warm salt water, held in the mouth, will sometimes banish tooth ache, and, at least, make the affliction lighter, while it is both safe and easy to try. Again, equal parts of alum and salt, or even salt alone, placed on a piece of cotton wool and inserted in the hollow of an aching tooth, will often give relief when other means have failed. To allay neuralgic pains in the head and face, take a small bag of flannel, fill with salt, heat thoroughly and apply to the affected part. A bag of salt placed hot to the feet, or any portion of the body, is better for giving and keeping warmth than is the conventional hot-water bottle. Salt placed on the gum when a tooth has been extracted will prevent profuse bleeding at such a time. An excellent gargle for the throat is simple salt and water. Many serious cases of throat affection might be cured by the use of this alone, if only taken in time, gargling every hour or half hour, as the need warrants. A flannel cloth, wrung out of salt water, is also an excellent remedy for sore throat. Salt in tepid water is a handy emetic; as an antidote for the poison, silver nitrate or lunar caustic, give salt and water freely.

The King's Cup

Last June, when King Edward of England was to have been crowned, but was delayed by the intervention of his serious illness, dinners were served in his name to thousands of London's poor. A special plate and cup for this ceremonial function of love was made, bearing the pictures of the king and queen, and the legend "From His Majesty." The plates and cups were taken away by the guests as souvenirs. Some of them have since been parted with by the impecunious owners, and one, bought of a London costermonger, at Christmas-tide, drifted into an American home the other day. It is a very beautiful bit of pottery, and greatly prized by its new possessor, though she is a Yankee girl who has never seen King Edward.

The Roses

From the wave-washed shores of the Gulf to the utmost boundary of northern bay or lake, from our farthest eastern to our farthest western coast, the roses have clustered over trellis and portico, nested in garden and bower, and adorned mansion and cottage impartially and made the land most beautiful. Queen of flowers is she, the peerless, the unsurpassed, the fascinating rose. Her petals soft as silk, her fragrance delicately refined, her shape exquisite and graceful, her generous bloom, her luxuriant and opulent suggestion of sweets, combine to crown the rose as sovereign of the flower-world. "Gather ye roses while ye may." This is the loveliest season of the whole round year.

"DOUBTFUL FRIENDS"

Rover the dog and Pussy
Are both beloved by all,
But they never grow quite friendly,
And prefer a good stone wall
To guard the way between them.
Though here they keep the peace,—
A growl from him, a hiss from her,
A truce that soon may cease.

"JIM AND ME"

By R. D. L.

A FEW years ago, I was a teacher in a mission school on the west side of New York City. While there, one day, a friend of mine heard a most pitiful case in that portion of the great city called "Hell's Kitchen," and she came to tell me of it.

The name sent a thrill through me, and I would gladly have given the task of furnishing relief to some more daring worker, but no one appeared. Beside that, my friend had come expecting me to respond to the call. She was fired with the desire to relieve, if possible, so touching a situation, but she could not venture alone; so together we went.

What my imagination had pictured fell far short of the painful reality. The mother of a new-born babe rested on a pallet of straw, covered over with an old quilt, in a room bare of all comfort. Two windows gave light to the gloomy home. Three of the small panes were stuffed with rags of different colors. A stove red with rust, a little brown tea-pot, and an old, dilapidated tea-kettle were the "ornaments" of the place, for the whole seemed too old and feeble for daily use.

Three chairs remained of the set formerly in position. An old blackened chest held something, doubtless, but evidently nothing in the way of bedding, for over a scanty quilt was thrown the day clothing of the little woman who lay beneath it. The tiny baby had come into this world only a little while before we reached this chamber of misery.

We stood appalled at the need of everything, from a bag of flour to a flannel shirt. Where could we begin?

An old woman in the house had come some time earlier and made a cup of tea for the mother; literally tea, for neither milk nor sugar was at hand. A crust of stale bread remained on a broken plate from the day before. Nothing else but the tea had passed the woman's lips since morning. Oh! for a magician's wand! I thought, to wave and see something like decent comfort suddenly appear. No kindly, skilful hand had been at work to give comfort to mother or children that day.

My more practical friend, meanwhile, was making a mental inventory of the most pressing needs.

"Why need we stay?" I asked her, "everything is wanted. Let us go and get what we can."

Just then the creaking of the door made us look around. There, cowering with fear, hunger and neglect, were two wee figures. The oldest might have been seven years old. They were peering cautiously into the room. They clung together, as if some one might set a price on them, and buy them, as the furniture had been bought, for food, and thus separate them from each other. They had wandered out, not knowing what else to do.

These were the children who had told my friend in the street of the "wee baby, no bigger than a doll" at home.

I went over toward the door and held out my hand. The youngest said, "This is Jim."

"Well, come in, Jim," said I, "and let us get acquainted with you. Now, will you little folks wait and watch here beside your mother, and your new sister, for a little while? This lady and I want to go out, and when we come back we will bring you some nice things to eat."

"Are you fairies?" asked one softly.

"No, only friends who would like to help you all if we may. Now sit right down here, and be good, quiet, nice children. We will bring you some nice, fresh buns."

With this promise we left, and went to the nearest baker and grocer, ordered supplies sent at once, and begged the dealer in coal to send his fuel as quickly as possible. We stopped for milk, and brought it ourselves.

Coming back we found "Jim and Me" waiting for the promised buns. We split the wood into kindlings, and made a fire. Shall I ever forget the delight that came into those wan faces. It was an inspiration. We could have worked all day on the stimulant of it. The little old, dull tea-kettle soon was puffing steam from its spout, and the fresh cup of tea "with trimmings," as the woman said weakly, was nectar to her parched lips.

"Milk and sugar are nice in tea, I think. Thank you so much," she said.

When we handed her the toasted bread she added: "And butter, too? How nice!" And the tears poured like a spring rain down her faded cheeks.

The children were busy with the bread and milk and buns, Jim proudly pointing to the "sugar all on the outside." They had had no food of any kind since the day before, and then stale bread only.

During the afternoon of the next day we went again to the dreary home, and then heard at length the story of misfortune. The father had lost a good situation through a malicious report. His employer found various reasons for thinking his place had better be filled by a younger man and would listen to no explanations. He had not the fortitude to brave the loss of his position, and in the quick oblivion of drink he buried his sorrows.

Matters went from bad to worse. Piece after piece of furniture was sold just to stop the pangs of hunger. James, the husband, when sober, got odd jobs to do, and if possible, the wife saved a bit from his earnings to add to her own.

Little "Jim and Me" came to us cautiously at first, but our arms encircled them very naturally, for they were starving for kindness as well as for food. I looked down once to see little "Me" gazing most inquiringly at us, from one to the other. As her big, pathetic, blue eyes fell on my face she said:

"You's fairies, really now, ain't you? Jim an' Me saw a fairy once. She was a beautiful lady, a'most, I guess, a angel. She had on a blue dress like the sky, an' some flowers that looked like stars. We told mamma about them, an' she said she guessed they was daisies that grew in the fields out in the country."

Jim here interposed, saying, "An' she told us a nice story about a little girl whose name was Fanny. She had ragged clo'se, an' was very poor."

And then the child went on to tell how this fairy went to get a loaf of bread of a kind gentleman who gave loaves away every day to poor children. Fanny would stand one side and wait till the other girls and boys had quarreled over the biggest loaves; then she took the smallest away to carry home, but first she thanked the kind gentleman and kissed his hand. The other children were noisy and quarrelsome and never thanked the gentleman at all; but Fanny always did. One day the children behaved badly and Fanny had to take the very smallest loaf left—smaller than any of the others. When the mother cut some slices for tea a quantity of money fell out of this small loaf. She was much surprised; but she thought it was some mistake, and sent Fanny back to the gentleman with the money and the bread. He told her that the money was hers—there was no mistake, for he had put the money himself into the smallest loaf, because Fanny was never greedy, and always quiet and grateful.

"Wasn't it a pretty story?" exclaimed Jim. "Was the kind gentleman a fairy? Mamma says you must be fairies, or angels, because God sent you, she knows. She guesses you don't live in Hell's Kitchen, and we wonder how you knew that papa had no work, an' mamma was sick an' we was hungry and cold. If you's a real woman, like mamma, how did you get such nice things right away for us?"

"Well, little Jim, we are just women like your own mother, only we had more money in our loaf, than you had in yours, and so we wanted to give you some. We love to see you happier."

"An' can you make papa drink water again, 'stead of ale, so mamma won't cry so hard when he comes home at night?"

"We will try, little Jim. I want you to kneel down every morning and evening and say: 'Dear heavenly Father, make our father drink water again and get steady work.' Then you expect him to get it, and see what comes."

It is now a year since little Jim began to pray that prayer. "Jim and Me" both go to school regularly. James, the father, has steady work, and is sober now.

The pallet of straw has gone; the old rooms are tidy; new furniture has been bought; they have two rooms instead of one. And that baby, "no bigger than a doll," is a thriving bit of humanity, making music for the family all day long.

Boer Missionaries

The statement is made in the Christian Express, of Lovedale, Africa, that the missionary ranks have received a large addition from the Boer prisoners, who, during the closing months of the war with Great Britain, were kept it St. Helena, Ceylon, India, and the Bermudas. It says that during their exile 175 of them were converted, and have since devoted themselves to life service as missionaries to the heathen. Returning home they have been received by the Dutch Reformed Church, and great preparations have already been begun to assist them to an education, that they may be fitted for their work. One congregation has subscribed $10,000 for land and buildings, another has undertaken to support twenty-one students at an annual cost of $2,500, another to support ten, and so on.

"THE HOOSIER EVANGELIST"

Rev. Henry Ostrom and His Labors as a Soul-Winner

IN a little village near the beautiful Bay of Quinte, off Lake Ontario, less than forty years ago, Henry Ostrom was born. He was the only brother among ten sisters, six of whom, with himself, taught public school. His mother's quiet devotion, he says, "drowned every argument against the Christian faith and was like a safe harbor from the storms of trial. Early in my life she dropped tears on my face, telling me I belonged to God."

Henry's father was a stickler for manual industry and cultivated intellect. He taught Henry to plough when he was twelve, and he had a table custom which called for the correction of misspoken English then and there.

Severe trial came when Henry was about sixteen. His father and three sisters died within fifteen months. Great property loss followed. Henry, under the sting of financial difficulty, struck out into the world and was soon teaching. Overwhelmed with the spiritual dearth in the community, he began a cottage prayer-meeting in the kitchen of the home where he boarded. Within a few weeks it developed into a series of revival meetings in which pastor and school-teacher were associated nightly as preacher and exhorter.

In less than two years, Henry was preaching and conducting religious services several times weekly, many people being attracted to the youthful preacher, who looked even younger than his years.

He had been accustomed ever since his conversion, which occurred in his fourteenth year, to lead prayer meetings and do some direct work as a soul-winner among his young associates and the sick, although during his boyhood, prior to his conversion, he had a prejudice against preachers. Soon after his conversion, the "quiet voice," whose meaning he could not at first quite divine, called him, until there was no question left as to his duty, and he preached his first sermon in his eighteenth year. The great Master ratified the call with conversions, especially among drunkards.

In Milwaukee, Wisconsin, one afternoon, ten years ago, under the preaching of B. Fay Mills, who was conducting a thoroughly evangelistic meeting there, Mr. Ostrom says "God got hold of me. In that voice 'softer than silence,' but authoritative as all-mightiness, he began to question me, speaking also fresh convictions and privileges to me with fresh power also. It was by far the most remarkable occurrence in my life up to that date. From that day I have really had a new life. The old sermons were cast aside and I went talking Jesus. A thousand old delicacies and fears about duty and victory were swallowed up by a humble confidence in the sufficiency of him who had condescended to intrust me with the power of the Spirit. I started forth into the more, more, more of this limitless provision of grace with an irrepressible conviction that we must abandon the idea of merely 'the better' and striking out for 'the best,' prove that these are opportune days within the church and through it out into the cities for a great spiritual awakening."

In the manufacturing cities, in the universities, in the great centres of population, in factories and mines, and in many places both in the United States and Canada, Mr. Ostrom has insisted upon the essentials of the orthodox faith as sufficient for the modern city, and has proven that without "traps or claptraps" the people will rally to that. "The watchword for the day," he says, "should not be 'broader,' but 'farther.'" "We do not need a new design, and much less a new architect, but we need to build higher, upon the same foundation where our fathers found the truth of Jesus solid."

During these years he has gone entirely without charge. Two books from his pen have received very creditable mention. His Out of the Crowd, is made of a body like motivated. His Foretaste Poems, is specially adapted to the afflicted.

Among his hymns Root Song is one entitled "O, what a day is coming," which begins with the following hopeful strain:

O, what a day is coming
When all the ills of time
My soul in great glory
What a glorious day
What a day it will be to be with Jesus
When I receive my crown

He is a remarkable example of God's using the weak things. He was admitted into the ministry under protest because of poor health and for years has been a matter of conference in his city-wide meetings, preaching sometimes as often as five times in a day. He says, "I do not try to explain it, just honor the Lord with your thanksgiving, for doubtless I would have been dead and lost, had not the colporteur sought me out and brought me to Jesus, in that country village recreated as for the difficulties in my later boyhood life, I cannot name any point which would have brought me humbly to consent to the blessed way God has opened up to me, but by the way of affliction. For any little help which my life may have brought to others, let them praise the Lord, for not only has the work been done by his strength, but the very perpetuation of my life here, I do believe, is due to his grace alone."

LOUIS ALBERT BANKS.

Reclaiming the Drunkard

It is now twenty six years since the Christian Home for Intemperate Men was founded in New York City. During these years, 7,000 men have been admitted. The work was inaugurated at the close of a series of Moody revival gatherings, and was founded principally by the late William E. Dodge, whose son, the Rev. D. Stuart Dodge, has been President of the Board of Directors during the last twenty five years. In 1902, the Home was moved from Eighty-sixth street, and established at Chester Crest, Mount Vernon. The new buildings accommodate 150 men. During last year 317 men were received, 200 of whom were unable to pay. These men are welcomed, after the management is assured by some responsible party that they are deserving; in other words, an unfortunate man, overcome by the drink habit, is not turned away because of lack of means on his part. The strength of the Home is in its spiritual life. The large number of men converted during recent years, has been the reason for the enlargement of the plant. The original idea continues to be carried out in practical treatment, namely: the application of the Gospel, careful nursing, wholesome food, clean beds, and Christian care while in the Home. The number of members at the present time is fifty, representing many leading Christian families from Montreal, Boston, and different sections of the country. The ability of the men who come to the New York Christian Home is greater than that of the average man. An interesting feature of the Home is the Christian training, through Bible-class work, which has resulted in developing many of the converts, some of whom now hold church offices, and are leaders in the cause of Christ.

A Hindoo Ashamed

Among the people of India there are many who feel the reproach of the contrast between themselves and the Christians. Mr. John Jackson, who is at the head of the mission to lepers, was speaking with some Hindoos during his recent tour, and told them about his work. He said the hospital was built with Christian money and was supported by Christians. "I admit," he said, "that we try to make Christians of the lepers and I suppose you do not approve of that, but as we support the hospital we think we are justified in teaching them Christianity." Among the Hindoos was a Government lawyer, of high standing and character, who said he had been surprised and ashamed at what he had heard, ashamed that it should be left to Christians of another country and race to care for "our lepers." "I feel," he said, "that the least we can do is to help them and stand by them." He immediately gave 300 rupees, and promised a monthly subscription as well.

NO DEATH

The ship may sink,
And I may drink,
A hasty death in the bitter sea.
But all I leave
In the ocean grave
Can be slipped and spared, and no loss to me.

What care I
Though falls the sky,
And the shrivelling earth to a cinder turn?
No fires of doom
Can ever consume
What never was made nor meant to burn.

Let go the breath
There is no death
To the living soul, no loss nor harm
Not of the clod,
Is the life of God,
Let it mount as it will from form to form

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Finding of an Orator

"STEPPING STONES," by Orison Swett Marden, belongs to a class of books known as inspiring literature. It is a sort of book of prescriptions for every day worries and troubles. No, it is more than that. It is the medicine itself. It serves as a deep breath of common sense. Here is a good paragraph:

"How wonderful is the power of a highly cultivated woman to change the face of society and to inspire with new thoughts all with whom she comes in contact. According to St. Beuve, the privileged circle at Coppet, after making an excursion, returned from Chamberg in two coaches. Those arriving in the first coach had a rueful experience to relate—a terrific thunderstorm, shocking roads, and danger and gloom to the whole company. The party in the second coach heard their story with surprise; of thunderstorm, of steeps, of mud, of danger, they knew nothing. No; they had forgotten earth and breathed a purer air; such a conversation between Madame de Stael and Madame Recamier and Benjamin Constant and Schlegel! They were all in a state of delight. The intoxication of the conversation made them insensible to all notice of weather or rough roads."

Here is a capital story:

A dark-visaged, unkempt man, who had evidently been on a protracted spree, but whose face retained some evidences of refinement, shuffled up to the desk of Stephen Merritt in his New York office, one bright summer morning a little more than ten years ago. In his hand he carried a battered hat, but so much did he tremble from the effects of long abstinence from food, and the nerve-racking consequences of strong drink, that the hat fell from his grasp, as he stood waiting for the merchant to look up. A week's growth of beard gave his face a tramplike appearance.

"Mr. Merritt," he began, falteringly, "I have been told that you are a friend of the unfortunate——"

There was something in the tone of the speaker's voice that caused Mr. Merritt to stop writing and turn sharply in surprise. He looked the man over scrutinizingly. Evidently, he thought, it was an unusual case. A pair of pathetic dark eyes looked, appealingly, straight into his. The tramp had once been a gentleman—that was plain.

"I am unfortunate; will you help me?"

In his bluff way, the philanthropist pretended to be very angry at the suggestion. While secretly resolved to help the poor fellow, he exclaimed:

"Not a cent for a drunkard! I have all I can do to assist those who are worthy. How dare you ask me for money, when you know you will go straight to a rum-shop with it?"

The dark eyes of the stranger snapped fire. The manhood in him had not been extinguished.

"Try me," he replied, as he bit his lips; "try me."

Down into his vest pocket went the hand of the merchant, bringing forth a five-dollar bill. Handing it over, he said, earnestly:

"I will try you; but, if I am deceived, as I have been so often——"

"You won't be, Mr. Merritt," interrupted the man; "you won't be. Your kindness will make a man of me."

He grasped the hand of his benefactor, and, in a choking voice, promised to reform, and to let him know.

It was late in the afternoon of the same day. The merchant-philanthropist was about to leave his office. He had been very busy all day, partly with the demands of his business, partly with the claims of the poor. A fine-looking man of about thirty-five was his last caller.

"What can I do for you, sir?" Mr. Merritt asked, just a trace of impatience in his voice.

"I have called," said the stranger, "to show you that I have kept my promise."

"What promise? Who are you?"

"Why, Mr. Merritt, don't you remember me? I called only this morning."

"This morning! I never saw you before in my life."

A merry smile brightened the dark face of the caller. His clean-shaven features would alone have prevented recognition. But in addition to a fresh shave, he had fresh linen, a well-blacked pair of shoes, plain but neat clothing, and a trim hat. These had worked a transformation in his appearance marvelous to behold. It required earnest assurances on his part to convince Mr. Merritt that his two callers were one and the same man. He explained in a few words. Fired with an earnest determination to reform, he had spent several hours in tidying up. His first investment was a good bath. Next he patronized a barber, then a ready-made clothing dealer, then a haberdasher. With his last twenty-five cents he had purchased a comfortable meal. Not a cent had gone for liquor.

So delighted was the philanthropist with the result of his experiment, that he procured work for the man in the office of Funk & Wagnalls, publishers of The Voice, addressing envelopes at fifteen cents a hundred.

"Do you know who that man is?" asked Sam Small, the noted prohibitionist, as he walked through the publishing house, and noticed the quiet figure of the new mailing clerk.

"No."

"He is John G. Woolley, one of the most brilliant men of the Great West, a man of the highest education and mental power. As a lawyer in Minneapolis, he was easily the leader of the bar of his State, his practice netting him from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars a year. But he fell, a victim to strong drink."

It was indeed true. An uncontrollable appetite had wrecked the home and the professional career of one of the brightest men in Minnesota. His wife had clung to him until he had lost all self-respect; then she had left him.

The struggle upward was a bitter one for the reformed man, but it was brightened by the love and helpfulness of true friends. Rev. Dr. Deems took an interest in him, and so did the late Dr. Boole. His devoted wife hurried to his side, and together they bravely faced the world again. Bankrupt in health as well as in purse, a period of rest was procured for him at Springfield, Mass. Then, one Sunday afternoon, he made his first temperance speech at Cooper Union, New York. It was electrical. Thrilling as were the words to the auditors, the speech was destined to have a still more powerful effect upon the speaker. It opened up a new vista to him. Strengthened by the consolations of religion, and encouraged by the promptings of his wife, of his friends, and of his own heart, Mr. Woolley resolved to devote his life to the work of saving others from the drink evil. His own reformation being permanent, his great talents soon began to find play. Within a year, there burst on the sky of temperance reform a star of the first magnitude, a brilliant thinker, an able party leader, a man of such impassioned eloquence that he swayed audiences as never temperance lecturer had done since the days of John B. Gough.

One day a splendid-looking couple drove up to the office of Mr. Merritt, and alighted. The one was Mr. Woolley, now a prince among men; the other was his devoted wife, her face beaming with happiness. It was the anniversary of the day when the greenback had been given to the tramp. The interview that followed was very dramatic. When it was over, three people were wiping their eyes.

"I knew you would be glad to see the good your five-dollar bill has accomplished," said Mr. Woolley.

"I'd sell out my business to-morrow, and go to work as a grave-digger," said the grizzled veteran, "if I could invest the money in chaps like you."

Joanna, the Temple Girl

A PREACHER from a distant village brought us Joanna, as one of the candidates for baptism. She was apparently about fourteen years old, and had for some months confessed Christ, and loved the Christian life, and she was well spoken of by the Christians who knew her. But she was a Matangi. Does that mean that she had some horrible disease, or that she was lame or deformed? No; it means that she had been devoted to a peculiar and disgusting service of the Goddess Ellamma. Being supposedly possessed by the spirit of the goddess, it is her function to perform the purifying ceremonies that precede all the heathen festivities, many of which cannot be held without her presence. How must she do this? She must dance and make all sorts of wild gesticulations, and affix the sacred marks to the foreheads of her worshipers, and even put in their faces, to make their hearts pure.

But even with this record, and a prospect of becoming a noted priestess with a lucrative income, ministering to the highest as well as to the lowest caste, she decided to forsake all and follow Christ. She could not go back to her heathen parents, so we took her into the Ongole Faith Orphanage, and gave her her new name, Joanna. For a time all went well, but after two months the mother came, demanding her daughter. She tried to persuade Joanna to run away with her, but the young disciple would not go back to a life of sin. A week later, the mother returned, this time to tell Joanna that her eldest brother was sick, and she must come to see him before he died. Joanna escaped the vigilance of the matron, and made her way—twenty-one miles—to her village home. She found her brother well, and then discovered that she had been caught in a trap, for they would not let her return, but tried to force her into her old work.

"JOANNA"

When we learned that Joanna had gone, we were greatly perplexed, but at once got three of our Christian people to go and see what could be done. They went to the village and found Joanna miserable enough. Her parents refused to let her return. "Why," said they, "we have already lost twenty-five rupees (about $8.50) these two months, because Joanna did not perform the purifying ceremonies at the harvest festivals." Twenty-five rupees is as much as an ordinary laborer earns by five months' steady work. The whole village gathered together, including the elders and the son of the chief officer of the caste village. "Will you go back with us, Joanna?" asked the orphanage matron.

"Yes, I want to go back, for I do not want to serve the devil; I wish to serve Jesus, my Saviour."

Then her own brother beat her on the head three or four times, and he said, "You must not say you want to go with them. You must say, 'I will not go.'"

Resistance was useless. Our Christians were severely threatened, and warned to go away. That evening we had a meeting of the Orphanage Christian Endeavor Society, and I told the children about Peter's imprisonment and his deliverance by the angel. "Now it is evident, as far as we can see," I said, "that Joanna is as securely held by her people as Peter was held and guarded by those Roman soldiers. But Peter's angel is able to deliver Joanna also, and to give her again to us." To this the little ones heartily assented; and we all together—they with a faith perhaps greater than my own—prayed that somehow Johanna might be restored to us. Many also were the prayers that were offered up for her in private. The next evening Joanna came back into our midst.

She escaped from her home in the early morning, and was helped on her way by a friendly merchant, who let her ride in his cart a long distance. Thus the prey was snatched out of the mouth of the destroyer. Look at her calm face in the picture and pray for her, that she may become a strong and faithful worker for our Lord.

A Circus Girl Spoiled

One of the pious undergraduates of Oxford, England, remembering his visits to Abingdon Fair, before his conversion, determined to go there again, and see if he could not do some good among the crowds of people who congregated in the streets and squares. He took a number of Testaments with him and hired a booth. He sold about fifty and gave the remainder away. The following year he went again with another supply of Testaments. Near the close of the day, a man who, from his garb, was evidently in the show business, halted at the booth and the undergraduate asked him to buy a Testament. "Not I," said the man, "but I have half-a-mind to punch the head off of you." The undergraduate looked at him in amazement and asked him why. "I'll tell you why," was the reply. "You spoiled the best circus girl I ever had. She bought one of these here books of you last year. Before that she was a first-class performer, and she made lots of friends of swell fellows who came to the circus to see her. They used to give her money and treat her to drinks, and they would stand treat all round. She brought lots of good money to the show; but after she got that —— book, she changed altogether. She quit drinking and would not have anything to say to the young men. Then she left the show and went to some religious women in London, and they got her a place in some home. If it had not been for your book, she'd ha' been with me now." It was a striking testimony to the power of the Word.

The Accompaniment

As an illustration of the truth that the Spirit makes intercession for those who know not how to pray, Dr. B. F. Meyer tells the following: "I was staying at a hotel in a town in Norway where was a little girl who had reached that most trying age when she could play one tune on the piano with one finger, always making the same mistake. This tune she would insist upon inflicting on the guests on all occasions when she could get access to the piano in the salon. Everyone was getting rather tired of her and her tune, until one day one of the leading organists in Norway, who was staying in the hotel, came to the rescue. Sitting down beside her, to her single notes he kept up a wonderful harmony of accompaniment, at sound of which the rooms emptied, and guests one and all poured into the drawing-room to listen. For half-an-hour he kept them entranced, and then, taking the little girl by the hand, introduced her to the company as the one whom they had to thank for the music they had been enjoying." Our poor halting prayers in the hands of the Spirit become acceptable to God.

"Kiss Your Mother"

I was visiting at one time in a beautiful home where lived a dear old lady, Aunt Abby. Seeing her sitting in her rocking-chair by the window one day, and looking a bit lonely, as I passed by I put my arm around her and kissed her cheek. She looked so pleased, and said, "Thank you, dear. Thank you." "Why, Aunt Abby," said I, surprised that she should seem to care so much. "My dear," she said earnestly, "Kiss your mother; kiss her often. You don't know how much good it will do her. Ah! we kissed them so much when they were little ones, the darlings! But now they have so much to do, and so many cares, it is not strange that they seem to forget. They are so kind and good, they want us to have everything and more than we need. It is only that they are always so busy. Don't forget, dear, to kiss your mother every day. It will make her very happy and—when she is gone, the memory will be all the sweeter."

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

By Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM CXXXVII
Psalm of Captivity

1. By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. 2. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof.

"REQUIRED OF US A SONG"

3. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?

The experience of Israel in captivity is the story of the present-day prodigal. Captive to sin, his song is unsung, his memory is at work giving him a taste of eternal despair. No backslider is ever happy, or ever can be; his wine of joy quickly turns into bitterness, and what he took for pleasure turns to poison. Only Christ can set the captive free.

PSALM CXXXVIII
Prophetic Psalm

4. All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O Lord, when they hear the words of thy mouth.

"KINGS SHALL PRAISE THEE"

5. Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the Lord; for great is the glory of the Lord.

Here is a tremendous bit of prophesy; enough to startle nations. When all kings of the earth begin to "praise God and sing," the underlings will fall in line and then will be seen the full world-power of the Gospel. Oh, Christians! hasten with God's Word to the ends of the earth. Speak it out; shout it out; sing it out, that his loving kindness is great and that from the high king in the palace to the low peasant in the hut, he hath respect and will save.

PSALM CXXXIX
Search-Light Psalm

1. O Lord, thou hast searched me and know me. 2. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising; thou understandest my thought afar off.

"THOU HAST SEARCHED ME"

3. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.

4. For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether.

Here you get X-rays stronger than Roentgen's, and a search-light that excels in power all those of battle-ships. The sinner whose sins are of the night, and the wicked who work their way in the dark, need to know this Psalm. Midday and midnight are alike to God. This Psalm is a warning to the wicked, but to the righteous, who must walk in a wilderness world, full of queer ways and queerer people, it is better than steel rails and headlight to a locomotive.

PSALM CXL
Battle Psalm

4. Keep me, O Lord, from the hands of the wicked; preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

"THEY HAVE SPREAD A NET BY THE WAYSIDE"

5. The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords; they have spread a net by the wayside; they have set gins for me. Selah.

6. I said unto the Lord, thou art my God; hear the voice of my supplications, O Lord.

7. O God the Lord, the strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.

"Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle." The God of battles is the power and defense of the true-hearted, whole-hearted. Poisoned arrows reach them not; snares laid, catch them not; nets spread, hold them not. A righteous nation, like a righteous man, is safe, either in time of war, or peace. This Psalm is to be read with the awful battle in the wilderness, by the Son of Man. He won, so can we, for he is with us. What a shout of victory is Romans 8! Read this, then read that.

A Warfare on Dancing

THAT dancing is a detriment to spiritual growth, and that waltzing is especially dangerous to morals and a menace to virtue, is the conclusion reached by a number of pastors in the State of Missouri. The Rev. L. D. Ewing, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Dexter, Mo., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning a combined movement against the waltz, which has just been organized in that section of the State. In his letter he says:

Editor Christian Herald—Dear Brother:—The enclosed is signed by five ministers, four of them pastors in this town. Two of them have had personal interviews with fifty leading and representative citizens of Southeast Missouri on the dangers of the waltz. Forty-seven of these say that waltzing is dangerous to virtue. Tens of thousands of fathers and mothers know nothing of its dangers.

Will you please publish this article, in the interest of our homes. I am confident that God will bless you for it. L. D. Ewing.

Accompanying Pastor Ewings letter is the following:

"Believing that thousands of mothers and fathers do not know the dangers of the waltz, we ask your attention to these facts:

"We had a personal interview with about fifty leading citizens of Southeast Missouri. These men have come from half a dozen States to make this their home. They are bankers, lawyers, editors, ministers, merchants, drummers, physicians, teachers, farmers. Some have graduated at the leading schools in the United States. We have asked each one the direct question, 'Is waltzing dangerous to virtue?' All of these men except three have said, 'Yes, it is.' Some of them who have waltzed, say they know from experience. Some of these men who have not waltzed, speak from observation. The Christian people among them do not waltz now. One, man who is now a leader in an evangelical church, said he taught waltzing for nearly four years, and he knows from these years of experience that waltzing is dangerous to virtue.

"A large number of mothers and fathers of this town have recently read a book on the subject, attacking the waltz, and they have told us that the leading thought of this book was true." (Signed),

L. D. Ewing, Pastor Cumberland Presbyterian Church.
Z. Ferrell, Pastor Baptist Church.
J. H. Couch, Pastor Christian Church.
W. Lowe, Pastor Methodist Church.
R. L. Russell, Presiding Elder, Methodist Church.

We commend the vigorous action of these Missouri pastors to other ministers. The CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to hear from clergymen elsewhere who have taken up arms against this specially objectionable form of dancing, for the sake of the morals of the young people in their congregation.

A Pioneer Summer Bible School

THE Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is a pioneer among summer Bible schools. Its founder, the late D. L. Moody, saw that the summer affords pastors and others an opportunity for study during their vacation, and also that the summer is as necessary and valuable as the winter for training in various methods of Christian work. Hence the Institution holds its sessions throughout the year. The schedule for the present summer includes courses in Bible, Gospel music and practical work. The music is under the personal direction of Prof. D. B. Towner, whose long experience in evangelistic work makes him an ideal instructor of singing evangelists. The practical work courses develop and test students in an all-round experience of the theories and principles they learn in the lecture room. Special lecture courses on Bible themes will be given by men of international reputation, including Dr. James M. Gray of Boston, Dr. John R. Sampey of Louisville, Ky., Dr. Elmore Harris of Toronto, and Rev. R. A. Torrey, who is soon returning from his eighteen-months' tour around the world

A convention of Christian workers will be held at the Moody Institute June 23-30, 1903. Prominent leaders, representing various phases of Christian enterprise, will make addresses and conduct conferences. The Chicago Auditorium, with seating capacity of 4,000, has been engaged for the opening session. Among those who will take part are Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, S. H. Hadley, evangelists Arthur J. Smith, W. E. Biederwolf, Geo. R. Stewart, Major Cole, and others.

PAUL'S LAST MESSAGE

From the Edge of the Grave he Issues his Final Appeals to the Churches

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PAUL'S second Epistle to Timothy is not only his last message to him, but to the church at large. It was written in prison, during his last imprisonment, when he knew that his martyrdom approached. It is most striking that in such circumstances this man of God has his eye so steadily on life and immortality. He had taught the Corinthians that the believing dead should be raised incorruptible at the coming of the Lord, and that the living, the mortal, should put on immortality. He speaks of "our Saviour Jesus Christ," who "abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel" (II. Tim. 1: 10 R.V.) He might have to pass through death, but only to be raised immortal; no more subject to death or corruption. He sees God as him that "quickeneth all things," and Christ as him "who only hath immortality" (I. Tim. 6: 13, 16), and that he shall judge the quick and dead by his appearing and his kingdom (II. Tim. 4: 1), and he loved that appearing.

The apostle very touchingly appeals to Timothy that he should not be ashamed of the testimony of our Lord nor of me his prisoner," that he should consider their "holy calling," and exhorts him to keep the good deposit which was committed to him "through the Holy Ghost, which dwelleth in us" (II. Tim. 1: 8-14, R.V. marg.) And then he calls on his beloved Timothy to be strengthened in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. Our strength is never in what we are or what we do, but in the grace which beholds us in Christ, "accepted in the Beloved." In us—i.e., in our flesh—dwelleth no good thing, and we can neither come truly down to the level of those who are lost, nor can we rise to true communion with God in that adoration which is speechless, except as we see what grace has done for us. Strengthened in grace, Timothy could pass on to others what Paul had taught him, he could take his part in suffering hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, he could with authority charge others in the sight of God that they strive not about words (II. Tim. 2: 1-3, 14, R.V. marg.)

But that which was especially included in the "good deposit" which was committed to Timothy was the Word of God. Paul exhorts him, "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead [a risen, living Saviour], . . . according to my Gospel, wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer." There would have been no persecution of Paul if he had not insisted that Christ was risen, and that he was coming again to judge both the quick and the dead. It is as though he would say, "Timothy, I fall in the conflict; but though I am bound, the Word of God is not bound; it will live though I die. Maintain everywhere that Christ is risen; that he is exalted, and that he is to be Judge of all men. Take sides with the mighty truth of a risen Saviour. Let men know that He lives who has died for them, and if you also fall in the conflict, souls will be saved, and He will raise us immortal when He comes."

But above all else, Timothy must be himself a sample of his teaching. "Give diligence to present thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the Word of truth." Paul lays down no rule for handling the Word of truth aright but the rule of a consistent life. He who lives near to God and studies the Scripture will have far more power in handling the Word than the most advanced scholar who has not tested its power in his own soul. That Timothy might know how to use the Word of God aright, he must "shun vain babblings"—useless talk; he must "flee youthful lusts"; he must refuse "foolish and ignorant questionings." He must "not strive, but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing, in meekness instructing [or correcting] them that oppose themselves." By this means Timothy might handle aright the Word of truth and learn what passages the Holy Spirit would use in such or such a case.

President Roosevelt's Newsboy

THIS IS WILLIAM SMITH, the boy who sells The Saturday Evening Post to President Roosevelt every Thursday. Last fall William started to sell The Post in Washington. He already sold newspapers. One day, after he had received his supply of the out-of-town newspapers, he passed the White House and noticed that some papers which he had had for almost two hours were just being delivered. Next day was The Saturday Evening Post day. As soon as he had gotten his package he started for the White House on his bicycle at top speed, and sold as many copies as possible among the attaches. A few days later the President noticed a newspaper which he knew was to contain something in which he was interested. He called for his copy, but was told that it had not yet arrived. Inquiry was made as to where the copy which he had seen came from. He was told that "it was delivered by William Smith, The Saturday Evening Post boy," it being related how he had been supplying the White House staff ahead of the regular carrier. The President left instructions with Secretary Cortelyou that William be brought to him. He shook hands with him and said that thereafter he wanted him to deliver his copies of the daily papers and The Saturday Evening Post. The story of "The President's Newsboy" traveled, and now, in addition to his newspapers, William sells from 400 to 500 copies of The Post each week, principally to members of Congress, the President's household, and department clerks.

There are 6000 boys like William Smith selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST all over the country. They do it Friday afternoons after school hours and on Saturdays. Some are making $15.00 a week. We want more boys. It costs nothing to start; we send the first week's supply of 10 copies free. If you write to-day, YOU CAN START NEXT WEEK.

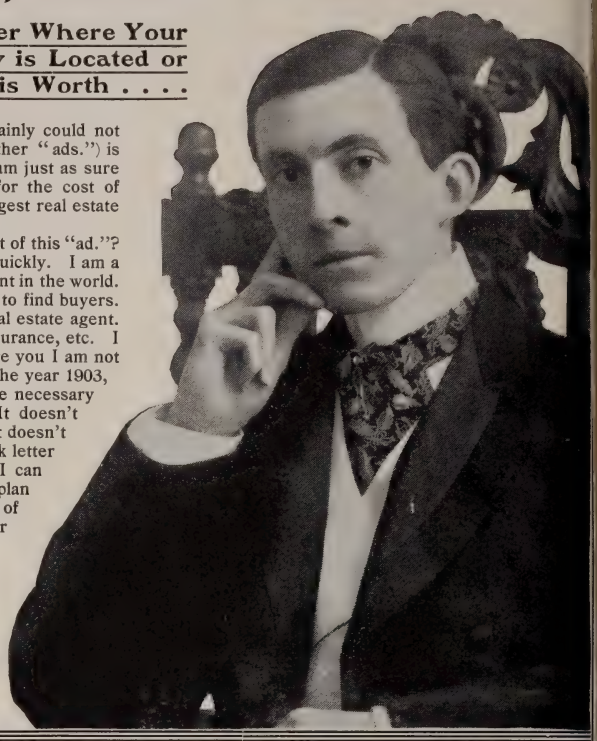
If You Want Cash

For your Real Estate,

I CAN GET IT

No Matter Where Your Property is Located or What it is Worth . . . .



IF I did not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. This "ad." (like all of my other "ads.") is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties, and make enough money in commissions to pay for the cost of the "ad." and make a good profit besides. That is why I have the largest real estate business in the world to-day.

Why not put your property among the number that will be sold as a result of this "ad."?

I will not only be able to sell it---sometime---but will be able to sell it quickly. I am a specialist in quick sales. I have the most complete and up-to-date equipment in the world. I have branch offices throughout the country and a field force of 2500 men to find buyers.

I do not handle any of the side lines usually carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I do not make any money through renting, conveyancing, mortgages, insurance, etc. I MUST SELL real estate---and lots of it, or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary, I expect to find, at the close of the year 1903, that I have sold twice as many properties as I did in 1902, but it will first be necessary for me to "list" more properties. I want to list YOURS and SELL it. It doesn't matter whether you have a farm, a home without any land, or a business; it doesn't matter what it is worth or where it is located. If you will fill out the blank letter of inquiry below and mail it to me to-day, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert your property into cash, and will give you my complete plan (free) and terms for handling it. The information I will give you will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. You had better write to-day before you forget it.

If you want to buy any kind of a Farm, Home, or Business in any part of the country, tell me your requirements. I will guarantee to fill them promptly and satisfactorily.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

J. K., New York, N. Y. How can an unbelieving husband be sanctified by a wife, as Paul states in I Cor. 7: 14?

Paul was writing to Christians newly won from a most corrupt and debasing form of heathenism. The converts were disposed to separate from their pagan partners and they wrote for Paul's approval. He told them not to do so. If the pagan husband or wife chose to leave, there was to be no restraint. The Christian must not be the one to seek separation. Rather he should remain in conjugal relations in the hope of saving his pagan wife (see ver. 16). His example and tender affection and Christian kindness might win her to Christianity—might be the means of sanctifying her. So the believing wife might influence the pagan husband. Besides, there was the consideration of the children, who, if the believer remained, would be brought up under holy influences.

H. L., Indianapolis, Ind. What defence, if any, has Russia made of the Kishineff affair?

The Russian Government, according to St. Petersburg dispatches, does not defend it, but condemns it. M. Von Plehwe, Minister of the Interior, has officially blamed the Governor of Kishineff and the other authorities for criminal negligence in failing to protect the Jews. Two high officials have been removed, by order, it is said, of the Emperor.

M. C. B., Plains, Mont. A lady missionary stopping overnight with me, said she was looking for the coming of Christ, inside of two or three years, according to the signs. She said there was a cross in the moon, and that a Russian Jew baby, three months old, had talked and prophesied that Christ should come in two or three years.

It is the duty of Christians to live at all times in expectation of His coming and to be prepared for it; but they are expressly directed to give no heed to those who pretend by signs and visions, to indicate the time of His coming. We have heard about the Russian child, and the moon cross, and there is no truth in either story. See Matt. 24: 23; Mark 13: 22, 32; and Luke 21: 8, 9.

S. E. R., Newburgh, N. Y. What is the origin of the name Amen corner, applied to certain parts of a legislative chamber or convention?

We do not know how it came to be used in that connection, but it is probably associated with one end of Paternoster Row, in London, England, which bears that name. The tradition about that thoroughfare and its corner is, that as it was near Old St. Paul's Cathedral, the choristers passed through it in procession on their way to and from service. They chanted the rosary as they went, and had just reached the Paternoster (our Father) at the beginning of the Lord's Prayer as they entered the Row, and as they reached the corner they had arrived at the end of the prayer —the Amen. A writer about the year 1310 speaks of Paternoster Row as the holiest street in London, because of the number of books, rosaries, and ecclesiastical paraphernalia sold there.

Mrs. J. D. W., Edina, Mo. Does the Greek Church acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope, or is it a separate organization, governed by its own patriarch?

They reject the claim of the Pope as Supreme Pontiff, but recognize him as patriarch, or head of one section of the church, the head of the Greek section being their own patriarch.

Old Subscriber, Winsted, Conn. I have heard it stated that there are only seven original languages, of which all other languages and dialects are composed. Is this statement correct? How many are there?

The only explanation of the origin of diversity of languages among men is that found in the Bible (Gen. 11: 1-9). Beyond this, the wide differences in speech must have resulted from the difference in surroundings and conditions. Jewish writers hold that Gen. 10: 5, 20, 31, indicates that the descendants of Shem, Ham and Japheth spoke seventy different languages.

L. E. R., Brooklyn, N. Y. I heard a preacher declare recently that Atheism is extinct, and that now no educated person denies the existence of a God. Is that true?

To a certain extent it is true; but the gain is not worth much elation. The present form of the attitude which we regard as unbelief, is that there is a potent force, whether mind or matter is not clear, pervading the universe, which is the cause of everything. It is a species of Pantheism that denies or ignores the personality of God, representing him as being in all living things and exerting a power which sustains and reproduces life. How far this is from Christ's revelation of God as our Father, you can see. No one can worship or love blind force. Still, it is a step in the right direction to abandon the belief that mere chance or molecular attraction accounts for the universe.

C. P. H., Beloit, Kans. Can you tell me of a school in which one can learn architecture, and, while studying, pay his way, or partly pay it, by doing some kind of labor for the school.

M. L. & H. C. Emery, architects, New York, reply to the above: "Cornell and Lehigh Universities both have architectural schools, and we understand afford some opportunities for students working out part of their expenses. Would suggest that your correspondent write directly to the institutions for the desired information."

R. E. M., Los Angeles, Cal. I notice in a theological work, a reference to the four great heresies. Can you tell me what they were?

There have been many doctrines which have been pronounced heresies by the theologians. The four, however, to which your author probably alludes were those condemned by the Councils of Nice, in 325; Constantinople, in 381; Ephesus, in 431; and Chalcedon, in 451. The first was the Arian, which declared Christ to be inferior to the Father. The second, the Apollinarian, declared that the soul of Christ was divine and his body human. The third, the Nestorian, contended that the nature of Christ was a combination of two persons and that the Virgin Mary was mother of only one of them. The fourth, called the Eutychian heresy, taught that Christ was divine without any admixture of humanity.

Reader, Savannah, Ga. I have seen somewhere a calculation of the cost of a criminal family which was traced through several generations, but have lost the particulars. Do you know of any such estimate?

The calculation has been made in several cases. The woman called "Margaret, the Mother of Criminals," was one case. The most remarkable, however, was that of the Jukes family, which is cited in Boles' Science of Penology. The head of the family was born about 1720. His descendants were traced down to the year 1874. There were in all over 900 of them. Seven were executed for murder; 60 served long terms in prison for serious crimes; 130 were imprisoned for stealing; 50 of the females were arrested at various times for leading vicious lives; 440 were sent to State hospitals for treatment for diseases of various kinds produced by drunkenness or other vices; and 310 were supported in almshouses. It was estimated that first and last the Jukes family cost the public nearly a million dollars, besides the private losses of the people whom they defrauded.

Inquirer, Germantown, Pa. What materials other than paper have been used for books?

The most ancient books we know of were made of clay. The writing was done while the clay was soft, and afterwards the tablets were baked. Complete libraries of this kind have been found in Assyria and have been deciphered. Many other materials have been used. In the British Museum there are books and manuscripts on bark, papyrus, palm leaves, leather, parchment, and the bones of animals.

UNVEILING THE STATUE OF VICE-PRESIDENT HOBART AT PATERSON, N.J.

Ten thousand spectators attended the impressive public ceremony at the unveiling of the memorial statue to the late Vice-President Garrett A. Hobart, in City Hall Plaza, Paterson, N. J., on June 3. The statue, which is the work of Philip Martini, is a remarkably striking likeness of the statesman who was the honored associate of the late President McKinley. It was the gift to Mr. Hobart's native State from Americans all over the country, who contributed towards its erection Many eulogistic addresses were delivered at the unveiling.

Enquirer, Eau Gallie, Fla. Who was the originator of the matrimonial bureau?

There were matrimonial markets in ancient times in Assyria, Babylon and Egypt, and we believe there are certain lands to-day where the custom is continued. The modern matrimonial bureaus, so-called, are generally regarded as humbugs.

Student, Hartford, Conn. What fixed star is nearest to the earth and how far is it away?

We believe astronomers are agreed that there is no fixed star nearer to us than Alpha in the constellation of the Centaur. In round numbers it is about twenty thousand million miles away. Its light would reach the earth in about three years and a half.

Ella R., Dayton, O. I am greatly interested in your announcement of a series of lessons in sight-singing. Will you kindly inform me 1. Whether, after following your course one will be able to read any music at sight? 2. When was harmonic music introduced?

1. Any one having a taste for musical study and who loves singing will be able to read ordinary simple melodies at sight after these lessons. That is, he or she will be able to give the key, to name the notes, sing them correctly and keep the time or measure. The course will prepare the way for voice-culture and the mastery of more difficult and intricate music, which can only come with study and practice. 2. Harmonies were introduced in the ninth century.

Subscriber, Topeka, Kans. I saw in a magazine recently, that the body of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites in Egypt, had been found, and was now in a museum. Was he not drowned with his army in the Red Sea?

The Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites was Rameses II. His body has been found and is in a museum in Egypt. You will see by Exodus 2: 23 that he died a natural death. It was his son Menepthah, who was on the throne when the Exodus took place. We have seen no statement of his mummy having been found. It may yet be, however. The inscriptions on the monuments appear to indicate that he survived the disaster that overtook his army at the Red Sea. He was of a timid, cautious nature, and probably did not accompany his army into the midst of the sea.

A. R. C., Santa Ana, Calif. It is unfortunate, that people living at a distance from New York should be impressed by exaggerated statements concerning the metropolis, which writers and speakers occasionally indulge in. There are many poor among New York's millions, yet there is nothing to warrant the statement that thousands die of privation and want. Any case of want coming to notice is instantly relieved. There are regular organizations for this special purpose. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has occasionally had the duty of helping the needy in the metropolis, but actual cases of starvation are rare. Our Bowery Mission, on the East Side, helps thousands of idle and homeless men and lads every year, but it seldom encounters the grim fact of death through starvation. We repeat, that we have the very best reason for believing that those statements of numerous deaths from starvation in New York are sensational and incapable of proof. Fortunately, such deaths are very few.

Inquirer, Reading, Pa. No; under the present immigration laws, if it can be shown that the passage-money of a newly-arrived immigrant has been paid, in whole or in part, by some one in this country, it is presumed that the newcomer is indigent, and consequently liable to become a public charge. In such a case, if it be not satisfactorily shown that the person is not likely to become a charge, the immigrant will be excluded.

I see by the paper, that the grave of Sarah Flower Adams, author of the hymn "Nearer, My God, to Thee," is unmarked. That hymn has long been our solace, and since the death of President McKinley, it is still more precious. Can't we raise a neat stone on her grave in England, and have this hymn inscribed upon it?

Here is a pleasing note from some Nova Scotian friends:

Dear Christian Herald:—We were surprised to see our picture in your number of May 13th, as we did not know you had ever heard of us. Our name is "The King's Own Mission Band," and we are one of the children of the "Woman's Missionary Aid Society," of the Maritime Provinces, whose work is among the Telugus, in India. Our boy, that we are supporting, is at school at Bimlipatam, one of our mission stations. He is a Christian, and is getting ready to tell the story of Jesus' love to others. He is a good, true, pure boy and getting along well in his studies. He wrote us lately: "I received with much joy the" two-edged sword"—that is, the Bible you so kindly sent me. What great love you have for the people of this country! I am able to read the small words in this English Bible, but not the big words. Pray that I may learn to read the big words, too. Please pray for me, that I may be an example to the heathen boys with whom I go to school, and also that I may study hard, so as to be able to do good work for the Lord.

THE GREAT WESTERN FLOODS

WHAT has proved to be the worst flood that has visited Kansas and Missouri in thirty years, is now subsiding, after nearly a week of unprecedentedly high tides. It became evident during the last days of May, that the Kansas and Missouri rivers were swelling to the danger mark, the spring freshets having been late and extremely heavy this year. On May 31 the flood came with terrific violence, accompanied by heavy rain, and soon the lowlands along the river front at Kansas City were a vast sea. Along both sides of the river, for a distance of many miles, dwellings, factories, gas-works, waterworks and other buildings were inundated, and the occupants compelled to seek safety elsewhere.

In the locality known as the East Bottoms, people were crying for help and shooting pistols from their upper windows. Many were rescued by boats from tree branches, telegraph poles, box cars and roofs.

Almost the entire population of Armourdale—a lowlying suburb of Kansas City, Kan., where there are great packing-house plants strongly built—was driven away by the flood.

At Topeka, Kansas City, Mo., Kansas City, Kan., and at other points extending for many miles either way, the raging rivers swept away their embankments at many points, and covered the bottom lands under from eight to thirty feet of water; carrying havoc and death with the inrushing flood.

Almost the entire manufacturing districts of the three cities, were submerged. Gas plants were flooded and rendered useless, and the cities were in darkness. What was even worse, the water supply was, for the time being, totally unavailable, causing much suffering and sickness. All telegraphic communications were cut off, and even railroad connections were well nigh severed. Sixteen bridges over the Kansas River went down under the violence of the torrent; the only bridge left standing in that section, being the Missouri Pacific Railroad bridge, at Kansas City.

As is always the case in disasters of this nature, the most alarming reports of the loss of human life prevailed. Many of these rumors were exaggerated. As far as can be learned reliably the loss of life at Kansas City, Kan., was between forty and fifty, at Topeka thirty-four, but there are many casualties at other points, which will swell the mortality list along the Kansas River to several thousands. Estimates of the losses to property differ greatly. One estimate places the loss at North Topeka at $1,000,000, on business buildings, dwellings, plants, railroads, etc.; another says it will reach $4,000,000, while that at Kansas City will also be several millions, and at Des Moines $1,000,000 or more. In the Kansas River Valley, the damage to crops and live stock will reach $4,000,000.

It is probable that the scenes of human suffering and terrible anxiety that took place during the three or four days when the flood was at its maximum have never been equalled in the memory of the oldest inhabitant of those sections. In Kansas City 20,000 persons were homeless, their dwellings either inundated or washed away. The police rescued 250. Relief work on a large scale was quickly begun and the homeless were sheltered and fed. Three or four days after the flood had begun to subside, there were still 1,500 refugees who were being taken care of. At Armourdale, where the packing-house plants were submerged, hundreds of the homeless were sheltered in the woods, and at Argentine, where the Santa Fe yards were inundated, the refugees fled to the high grounds back of the suburb. These two places, with Riverside, were practically blotted out of existence for the time being.

In Topeka, 7,000 flood refugees were to be cared for, and all the lodge-rooms, churches, and public buildings were converted into dormitories and living rooms for the sufferers. There was a good deal of sickness, but no epidemic. The streets were like canals, and the country for miles around was flooded; railroad tracks washed and trains stalled, so that only the tops of the cars were visible. On one morning, 500 refugees were breakfasted in one of the public buildings. In North Topeka, hundreds were imprisoned in their houses by the swift rise of the waters, and completely isolated.

Those who witnessed the scenes during the height of the flood can never forget them. Men and women could be seen in the upper parts of houses, waving cloths as signals of distress, or shouting for aid. The darkness of those nights was made appalling by the frequent cries for help. In the daytime, bodies could be seen floating down the rivers, and sometimes also buildings, or large sections of wreckage. Many daring rescues were reported. One man drew from the river a cradle with a baby in it—the little one all unhurt and having escaped death almost miraculously.

TWO VIEWS OF THE FLOOD IN KANSAS CITY, KAN.

In response to appeals for aid on behalf of the homeless refugees, the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD telegraphed to Mayor Craddock, of Kansas City, Kan., and the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, of Topeka, authorizing them to draw on him for one thousand dollars each for the relief work. The Mayor of Kansas City, replying, telegraphed that 40 per cent. of their 60,000 population was homeless and dependent on charity.

A telegram from the Rev. W. Potts George, of Kansas City, says that many of the sufferers were thirty-six hours without food, and that they "will require to be helped several weeks. Absolute prohibition prevails in both cities, all the saloons being padlocked. Every saloon is closed, and every church and schoolhouse open."

Pastor Sheldon (who is already well known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers), is active in the relief work in Topeka, and is co-operating with the city authorities. At latest reports the situation was more encouraging. The waters were rapidly subsiding at Kansas City and Topeka, though still very high at many points.

On the whole, however, the prospects for an early return to normal conditions were promising. Many of the Kansas City refugees were living in tents on high ground and were supplied with Government rations. The relief work generally was well in hand.

Contributions for the flood sufferers, sent to this journal will be acknowledged and forwarded to Mayor Craddock, of Kansas City, Kan., and Pastor C. M. Sheldon, of Topeka.

"The Christian Herald" Sends Aid

In response to the offer of help telegraphed to Kansas and Topeka by this journal, the following telegrams were received:

KANSAS CITY, Kan., June 5,

Dr. Klopsch,
CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y.

I will draw for one thousand dollars at sight in favor of Treasurer of our Relief Committee. Our citizens have long known of the broad Christian spirit governing your life and action. The substantial evidence of it calls from our grateful people an earnest prayer that all blessings may come to you and yours.

W. H. CRADDOCK, Mayor.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, CHRISTIAN HERALD, TOPEKA, KANS., June 3, New York.

Your generous contribution of One Thousand Dollars for flood sufferers thankfully received. Will use immediately.

CHAS. M. SHELDON.

Dr. Klopsch also telegraphed through the Rev. W. P. George, of Westminster Congregational Church, Kansas City, Mo., an offer of aid to that city if such were desired. The Mayor and the Relief Committee, to whom the offer was presented, returned cordial thanks, but the resources at the city's command were considered sufficient for present emergencies.

The American Pulpit

The MODERN EUTYCHUS;

Or, Why People Go to Sleep in Church

A New Sermon by Rev. CHARLES M. SHELDON, Topeka, Kansas

ACTS 20: 9—"And there sat in the window a certain young man named Eutychus, borne down with deep sleep"

TO be sure it was after twelve o'clock at night, and Paul had been preaching three hours at least. Cannot blame the young man much for falling asleep under those circumstances, even though Paul was the preacher. When you think how easy and natural it is for some people to fall asleep just when the minister begins with his firstly, it is a wonder that Eutychus didn't fall out of the window earlier in the evening. There is one satisfaction for the audience in reading this story. The window was open, and there was probably plenty of fresh air, so that the preacher could not blame the sexton for the drowsiness of his hearers. No, it was clearly Paul's fault altogether, and any one of us in Eutychus' place would probably have done just what he did! only we would have tried to get into the corner of some comfortable pew, where we could sleep it out, without danger of falling down from the third story and being taken up dead.

I suppose we have no right to blame this young man, because we know absolutely nothing about him. He might have been working hard at some honest toil all day, and his only mistake was in going to church when he ought to have gone to bed. He may have sat up with a sick friend the night before, and become sleepy in that way; or he may have been carousing, and having what young men call curiously enough, a "good time," and in that way prepared his body for a drowsy time when the reaction began. We are not going to criticize Eutychus for falling asleep in church, because most of us have done that ourselves, and we don't want to judge him without knowing the facts in the case. There are times, undoubtedly, when it is difficult to keep awake, especially if the preacher is half asleep himself. We must not question that point now. What we are interested in is this: Why is it that so many people are sleepily indifferent to preaching, or to the Gospel? Is it because the Gospel has lost its awakening power, or is it because it has been preached for so long that it has lost its interest? What is your duty and mine in the matter of putting life into people who are morally sleepy, and will soon be morally dead, beyond even God's power to wake them up again?

Responsibility of the Pulpit

We will take up two sides of the question. First, Considering the relation of the pulpit to the Gospel preaching, and second, The reason for drowsiness, sleepiness, and moral death, on the part of those who constantly hear the Gospel preached.

It is not often that the pulpit gets just criticism from itself. It shrinks naturally from ignorant estimates passed upon it by those who think they know all about parish work, and sermon writing, and organized Christian activities; and on the other hand when the ministry confronts itself squarely, it is often puzzled to know what to say to itself; whether it should be soft excuse or sharp rebuke for not preaching the Gospel in a more enthusiastic, earnest, living way to men. Did you ever think how much the ground of the Gospel has been gone over? Men have been preaching from the same subject and using the same old texts for the last nineteen hundred years, and it is sometimes a little appalling to a young preacher to think that he must get sermons from the same words which have been used already a hundred times by far better, abler men, than himself. It may happen that a young preacher is called to a church where his immediate predecessor has been preaching two sermons a week for twenty-five or thirty years. Think of the sermons and texts represented by such a pastorate! It will be a little strange if the young man does not use some of the texts that have been used before; and it may not be very pleasant for him to have some one say to him after the service, "Our old pastor once preached a splendid discourse from those very words which you used for a text this morning."

Life in the Word

You see what I am aiming at. The pulpit might begin the excuse that the material for preaching is pretty well used up; that it is only with the greatest difficulty that men can be reached by preaching. I do not believe any such thing. The trouble is with the preacher, not with the preaching material. We might as well say that God was worn out, because he has been in existence so long. There are some things that do not get worn out by being rubbed; they only get brighter; the Gospel is one of these things. Its power is in it, and a wide awake man can always find it. It will never become stale to the human taste until the human soul changes its constitutional make-up, and becomes something entirely different from its present self.

Granting now without discussion, the vitality of Gospel truth to interest and awaken men, if it is only presented to them as it ought to be, is not this true? The preacher who wishes to reach men with these old truths, must preach sermons which contain heart-beliefs, the most real and personal that he possesses; the beliefs which are sacred treasures of his private as well as of his public soul. What seems to be lacking in many public men nowadays—preachers, lawyers, legislators—is sincerity, blood-earnestness, downrightness, as well as uprightness. If there is anything which a preacher ought to dread, it is two sets of religious beliefs—one for the pulpit, and the other for himself. Is it saying too much to say that if every preacher preached exactly what he believed from his pulpit, there would be some astonished congregations in some churches next Sunday?

Then again, is not this true? The Gospel to be effective must be preached with simplicity. Simplicity of thought and wording, and so far as possible of delivery; although this last will depend more or less on a man's temperament. A speaker's delivery is the expression of his personality, or ought to be. That ought not in any case to affect the simplicity of his thought. But if there is anything discouraging to a young preacher, it is the knowledge that in spite of this very simplicity which he is reaching after, his hearers will at first fail to appreciate him. Just as the old Scotch woman who went to hear the famous Dr. Chalmers, remarked, in a disappointed tone: "Why, I could understand everything he said! I don't call him a great preacher!" You see, one of the greatest temptations for a small speaker is to become a great orator, and in yielding to this temptation, he will almost always be encouraged by his congregation. It is strange, but it is true, that very many persons will mistake simplicity for mental inability, and naturalness for want of expression. Just as if the truth depended for its worth or weight on a pulpit tone, or so many gestures to so much manuscript.

Perhaps there is some excuse for a preacher who prepares two sermons a week, for falling into a loose, shambling style. There is never any excuse for writing a single sentence so complex or involved, that it cannot be understood by the large majority of an audience as soon as it is spoken. Take, for example, a sentence like this, from a sermon written by a New England minister, and preached to a large audience of men and women of no more than average ability: "The religious principles which determine our relations to the complicated mechanism called society, and from which we adjust our perceptions of the different phenomena which go to make up cause and event, are largely the result of long continued investigation into the purposes of Moral Law, and rest back, finally, on two essential ultimata of knowledge, viz.: That God is, and that he is the philosophical answer to the captious and rationalistic perturbations of modern theology." Carlyle would have said "Bosh!" to such a sentence as that, even if he had written it himself. The audience which heard the sentence so delivered, perhaps thought it was very fine, but not one single person knew what it meant, and the majority did not care to know. A few sentences like that would send the liveliest person asleep very soon, if they did not have the effect of keeping one awake to puzzle out what they meant. Men and women with every-day needs and immortal souls, cannot be reached by any such preaching as that. That is not preaching. At least, it is not preaching the Gospel.

Then again, what the pulpit needs in its relation to the presentation of Gospel truth, is the imaginative faculty. Sincerity and blood earnestness will count for much. Coupled with genuine simplicity, they will do far more. Add to these necessaries an imagination that can pour warmth, and color, and light, into, and all over, and all around a subject, and the pulpit has solved the problem of old truths for new generations. There is a much difference between a sermon with the imaginative element, and one without it, as there is between a pump and a spring. One has to be worked, and the other works itself. It is a question whether the sermon has a right to compete, within certain limits, with the newspaper or the popular novel. I do not mean by that, that it is the duty or the necessity of the pulpit to amuse or entertain. It has a far higher, more sacred office than that. But unless the presentation of old realities in sermons and in preaching, can be made rightfully attractive, what will reach men, and give them the intense interest they always feel when they are deeply moved by entertainments or by books?

Earnestness Infectious

I do not know why a church should not draw as large a crowd as a theatre. But it never does, unless the crowd finds something in the service to draw it into the church. Paid professional singing won't do it, at least not for very long, nor with the result most needed. Gilded architecture and stained-glass windows won't reach men's hearts, and affect their lives very much. I know of only one thing that will attract men, and keep them from listening to the old Gospel with drowsy eyelids, and that is a pulpit fully alive to men's needs, speaking out of a full heart, so full that it sometimes splashes over and chokes for utterance; speaking so that men can know and feel the reality of what is said, and go away better men than they came. If the Gospel can't do that yet, then it is not what we want. We are mistaken in it. If a preacher cannot use it effectively, then perhaps he has no business to be a preacher. If a man's audience has a confirmed habit of dropping off the window-ledge like Eutychus, it seems to me that that is a pretty good hint that the preacher has a very loud call to get out of the ministry.

So much for the relation of the pulpit to the presentation of old Gospel truth. What has been said is only the merest outline, suggestive, not exhaustive, of the requirements and responsibility of the preacher. We were going to consider, in the second place, some of the reasons for the indifference to Gospel truth on the part of those who have heard it preached for so long. Some of the reasons for moral stupor, ending in moral downfall and death.

We said that we would not pass hasty judgment on Eutychus for falling asleep, because we don't know just what the circumstances in his case were. But I don't believe that when Paul went down and restored the young man to life, that Eutychus found fault with Paul's preaching because it was too long, or too stupid. If ever a preacher came up to the necessary requirements of earnestness, sincerity, and love for souls, Paul did. And then, you must notice, there is no mention made of anyone else dropping off to sleep. Eutychus seems to have been the only one. Taking him, then, as a type of those who are not impressed by the Gospel even when it is rightly and strongly presented, let us see if we can fairly outline a few reasons for the sleepiness of the modern Eutychus.

Wasted Vitality

One of the reasons for a drowsy mind, is a drowsy body. A man who stupifies his physical nature by excesses, or lust, is in no condition to understand and appreciate a beautiful moral truth. Here is a very simple illustration. A young man in good health, an elastic step, a clear eye, a definite purpose in life, wakes from a sound sleep to look out on the dawn of a new morning, and rejoices in the exhilaration which breathes from the sun and air, bird and blossom, hilltop and meadow land. There is a sound of music in the aromatic pines and spruces; there is a fragrance of flower just swept with translucent dew, filling all space; the resurrection of Nature's forces impresses itself upon him, not like a stiff, hard fact, so much as a truthful fancy; and he calls upon all that is within him to praise the Lord for making such a world, and giving him such power to enjoy it. Nature, many-voiced, and beautiful with a youth that is old, and old age that is still young, appeals to a healthy mind and body, with a power as sweet as it is powerful, and as full of meaning as it is empty of flattery.

But let the same bright morning, with its gold and silver lining, gleam just as freshly upon a young life which has smirched its robe of purity by a night's debauch, and how much meaning has all of Nature's richness to such a soul? He is in no condition to respond to it. His head aches, his hand trembles, his tongue is dry, the brute part of him is paying him off for abusing God-given powers, and Nature may play her sweetest tune for him in vain. By his own act, he has put himself outside of her majestic touch, and, turning his back upon the sunlight, which dazzles his eyes instead of awaking them, he drops into a slumber again, and so the glory of that morning passes from him forever.

A Fair Chance for the Truth

Just so, to the Eutychus who has heard the truth preached even by some modern Paul, there is no beauty in it, that he should desire it, because the baser physical side is uppermost too much of the time. Ask a man who is anxiously looking for pins on the ground, to take a peep through a telescope at a star, and he won't hear what you say at first. That does not take away from the splendor of the star, however. It is a fair question to ask a man who never listens to the Gospel, because he says it never did him any good, "What are you doing to give the truth a fair chance at yourself?" How is a man going to hear good music, and know that it is good, unless he takes the cotton out of his ears? How long are you going to let your body run your soul?

Another reason for the stupor of moral apprehension in the presence of preaching is the fatal habit of minute criticism, which can wrap more wet blankets around a sermon and a preacher than anything else which a terrible human being can devise. Those who hear the Gospel in this mental attitude are wide awake enough externally, but spiritually they are growing drowsier and deader every year.

The receptive character is the one that is going to get the most out of life. Why shouldn't we always be ready to apply what we may call a moral sponge to whatever is good, or noble, or helpful, and absorb it into ourselves? Instead of that we go around with a microscope, and a set of sharp dissecting instruments, and we are as much delighted when we discover some tumor of sin or imperfection as if we had discovered a new planet. We are a little disappointed if we can't pick a flaw in something or somebody, but even then we console ourselves with the reflection, "Only give us time, and we'll find something there that isn't just what it ought to be." I have sometimes wondered if there were among Paul's hearers some few persons who were even more to blame than Eutychus. They didn't go to sleep, but they picked Paul to pieces unmercifully when they got home.

Paul, you know, was a small man physically. It is supposed, also, that he stammered badly while preaching. What a beautiful chance for the critics! How they could ridicule his appearance, and his delivery! The burning truth, the magnificent earnestness of the man, the intense love which glowed in the speaker's eye and must have transformed even a homely face, all these counted for nothing with persons who were as sharp to pounce on a grammatical error or mispronunciation as they were slow to acknowledge the truth even in the absence of grammar; and who thought more of the preacher's necktie than of his love for souls.

What is the object of listening to the Gospel? Is it to criticize the man who is preaching it, or run his thought through the hydraulic press of our exterminating judgment, squeeze out all the living juice, and take home the pulp? Or is it to put ourselves in the attitude of those who are so eager for the good and the true, that they will take all a man has to give of the good and true, and throw the rest away? We need not eat nutshells because they happen to be in the same plate with the meats. I consider myself the grateful debtor of a man who can impart some good or helpful thought to me. I may not believe all he says; I may even question the wisdom of some of his methods; I may differ from him in my theory of the Atonement; but if he has something to tell me, if that something has to do with my highest interests, and I know he has no selfish purpose in it all, I will listen to him reverently, and count him, for the time being, my superior.

Seeking Gospel Gold

There is a process in quartz mining by which the precious metal is separated from the worthless rock and rubbish. A proper amount of quicksilver is put into the mixture, and it reaches out innumerable nimble fingers after the gold or silver, until it is all gathered up within itself, and upon the application of heat it lets go of the rich ore, and is ready to do its work again as a searcher after the good. That's what we ought to be—balls of quicksilver, with an affinity for the pure metal.

Again, the modern Eutychus is to be found in the largest numbers among those who deny the practical good of preaching. "There isn't any money in it." It is a good thing to have a preacher around Sundays and on funeral occasions, and it adds respectability to a community to have a church or two in it, but so far as being absolutely necessary, like stores and banks, or even schools, why that is another thing. Now I don't say that men actually speak such thoughts very often, but that is what Eutychus says to himself, as he settles back in the window-seat and prepares for a doze, so as to be fresh and active for the business of Monday. Well, if Gospel preaching in these days isn't made practical, that is the fault of the preacher, not of the Gospel. I am willing to let this sentence be challenged by the most practical business man in this town. A man who is wide awake to the preaching of Christ's love and who accepts it as the best thing in the universe for him, in other words, the man who is a Christian, will make a better business man than he who goes off to sleep morally whenever he hears the Gospel. Mind, I don't say a Church member, but a Christian. And I don't say that the Christian will always make more money than the other man; the men who make the most money are not the most useful men in the place.

Personal Application

Is the best reason for moral drowsiness a failure on the part of Eutychus to make preaching directly personal? Suppose Paul, as he preached that night had begun his sermon by some such words as these, which he used afterwards in a letter written to a young man. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief." As these words fell upon the ears of Eutychus, what if he had said, "If that man is a great sinner, so great that he calls himself the chief of all, what am I? I have a good mind to stop that little man who said those words, and ask him what I must do to be saved? But perhaps if I keep on listening he will tell me." So Eutychus sits up and listens eagerly, forgetting the weariness of his body, forgetting to criticise the stammering speaker, finding in what he is saying the most absorbing practical interest, and then after a while he hears Paul say something like this: "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." "That's practical enough," says Eutychus, to himself, and then he hears Paul say this: "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new." "Stop there," cries out Eutychus, and he leaps down from the window-ledge and crowds his way up to Paul; "tell me what that means?" And as Paul confronts this wide-awake soul, and in warm, glowing words tells him the story of the Cross, and of his own conversion, Eutychus begins to live, and a nature that was morally dead has the birth of the new life.

Will you be the Eutychus who fell down from the window and was taken up dead, or will you be the Eutychus who listens to the Gospel as for his life? Make it personal to yourself, and don't wait for a miracle to breathe life into a moral corpse. For nothing less than that is needed for the modern Eutychus who is sleeping the sleep of death under the earnest preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

What the World Owes to the Jew

WHILE so much is being said about the persecution of the Jews in Russia, it would be well to consider how much modern civilization is indebted to the Hebrew race. Extending through a period of nearly four thousand years, they have a panorama of history that may well challenge the wonder and admiration of the world. The race is honored with a list of great and worthy characters, incomparable to anything else in history. They have Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, and the other prophets. They have the apostles and the early fathers of the church; and, to crown the race with honor and glory, beyond all comparison, they have Jesus Christ—the Son of God, the Prince of Peace, the Redeemer of mankind. What would the world be to-day without the light and influence of those great characters? This question can hardly be answered. In some of its great characters, it is conceded that the Hebrew race has reached the climax of greatness. Abraham is said to be the most faithful man, Solomon the wisest, Samson the strongest, and Moses and the Apostle Paul the two greatest human characters that ever existed. It is a question as to which is the greater of the two. Only think of the experience, the achievements and the influence of two men—great and wonderful, grand and glorious, beyond the power of tongue or pen to express. What would the world do without the light of these characters?

The Bible has had a wider influence than all other books combined. It is truly the Book of books. We must remember that it was written by Jewish authors. What would the world be without its influence?

The Jews have retained their identity through a period of nearly four thousand years. The race comes down to us, through the ages, with its purity of blood, like the Gulf Stream running through the ocean. There is nothing else like it in all human history and experience. It proves that there is a divine purpose with these people. It shows that they are God's chosen people, through whom he has revealed his will to the human race. No other people can claim this honor.

The world owes much to Saxon, Roman, and Greek influence; but it owes more to Hebrew influence than to any of them.

In consideration of the great mission and influence of the Hebrew race, the heart and soul of Christianity should feel and express itself thus: Sons and daughters of the Hebrew race, we love you. We love you for what your race has done for the world. We love you for the sake of the great and glorious characters your race has produced. We love you without regard to the imperfections and differences of opinion that exist on both your side and ours. We love you more than all for the fact, that your race has been God's mouthpiece to humanity, through whom he revealed his holy will to the human race.

It is the duty of all Christendom to aid and protect the Jews, as far as possible, against such atrocious outrages as have lately occurred in Russia, and which are a shame and disgrace to that country. The Christianity that can countenance and tolerate such crimes is not worthy the name.

Lynchburg, Va. Respectfully, J. W. OGDEN.

TWO VIEWS OF THE KISHINEFF RIOTS

The Emperor Causes the Russian Version to be Cabled to "The Christian Herald"

TO-DAY, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in accordance with its invariable rule of "hearing both sides" of a controversy, gives on this page the Russian official version of the Kishineff riots and their cause, cabled specially by the Czar's direction, to this journal. Side by size with this is given the graphic story written by Mr. Michael Davitt, who personally visited Kishineff, as the representative of the New York Evening Journal.

THE CZAR OF RUSSIA

Last week Dr. Louis Klopsch cabled to the Russian Imperial Government the following:

To His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, St. Petersburg.

In the interests of justice and humanity, I ask Your Majesty to cause Russia's side of the Kishineff affair to be cabled to me for publication. LOUIS KLOPSCH.

To this request the following reply, prepared by the Imperial Chief of Police, by the Czar's direction, has been received by cable:

The Official Report

Government, St. Petersburg, June 4.

The Christian Herald, New York.

Russia's agricultural and laboring population is ill at ease, living the common life with Jewish inhabitants of widely-developed commercial instinct; hence there is constant antagonism, the material differences in racial and religious character coming to the verge of frenzy at the least possible occasion.

The strained relations existing between the Russians and Jews of Bessarabia were made worse by the fact of finding, in an outlying village, a murdered Christian boy. The murder was attributed by the population to the ritual and to Jewish habits.

Official denials of the ritual murder were not given credit by the peasants, who attributed other murders of Christians in the towns of Kieff and Kishineff likewise to the Jews.

Beginning of the Riots

On Easter Day, in the market-place of Kishineff, the workers, while holiday-making, saw the Jewish proprietor of a carousal machine strike a Christian woman, who fell to the ground, letting go her infant baby. This incident was the immediate cause of an outburst. The workers began breaking windows and pulling down Jewish stores, as a sign of protest. The police, who always leave much to be desired in provincial towns, failed to make efficacious intervention, the many thousands in the mass of onlookers and holiday-makers approving the riot, and hindering the policemen's actions.

After demonstrators came plunderers, the outbreak lasting from five in the afternoon to ten in the evening, and leaving nine Jewish bodies on place. Night brought the disturbances to an end.

The Brutal Russian Peasantry

What goes far to prove the momentous character of the outbreak in letting loose the popular passions with the strength of natural forces, is that on Monday morning the Jews, wishing to intimidate and inflict punishment on the Christian workers, began assembling in the Market Place in groups, armed with sticks and other weapons. The Jews being the more numerous, had the best of it in the two first encounters, and a Christian was seen to fall, receiving a bullet wound. This called forth the popular passion in all its abject force and abomination; the Russian peasants when driven to frenzy, excited by race and religious hatred, and under the influence of alcohol, being worse than those Americans who lynch negroes.

Unfortunately, the Governor of Bessarabia did not make his appearance in person on Easter Sunday, and on Monday he gave over the command to military men, which he had no right to do, as he, in consequence, laid the police aside and, on the other hand, left the military forces without actual guidance. Troops can take towns by assault, but cannnot carry out police duties without special instructions.

Punishing the Derelict Officials

In the end, the town, being divided into districts, with a special military command in each, the disturbances ceased on Monday evening. By this time, the Minister of the Interior had ordered by wire the proclamation of martial law, and an unprecedented fact had sent the director of the police department to investigate as to the responsibilities of local officials. In consequence, the Governor, the Chief of the Town Police, and some other officials were dismissed outright, many hundreds of rioters are in prison, and hard work in the Siberian mines awaits them.

The Minister of the Interior has issued a circular to Governors all over Russia, authorizing them to make immediate use of firearms in case of anti-Jewish disturbances.

Russia Condemns the Riots

The Russian Government is the first to disapprove of such horrid acts of violence, but it cannot, in compliance with requests of a radical and revolutionary press, give the Jews new rights of citizenship, as this would be sure to drive the Russian population to new excesses against the Jews, who are hated by the peasants with such extraordinary force.

LOPOUKHINE,
Director of Imperial Police Department.

Michael Davitt Gives the Result of his Full and Impartial Inquiry

IN the New York Evening Journal, Michael Davitt writes from Berlin, giving many interesting and significant details of the recent Kishineff riots. He says the real cause of the trouble was the persistent attacks by the Bessarabyetz, the anti-Semitic paper, whose editor, Kroushvan, is the relentless foe of the Jews. It was this paper that circulated the false charge of ritualistic murder by the Jews and worked the Russian populace up to a pitch of frenzy. The police and Governor von Raabon were warned, but nothing was done to stop the attacks of the Bessarabyetz. Chief of Police Ichanzko declared that it would "serve the Jews right if they were driven from the city for encouraging the propaganda of Socialism."

Brigands Help the Rioters

"The superstitious populace, seeing the Jewish warnings unheeded, planned an attack for the Easter holidays. A few days previously a band of Albanian and Macedonian brigands, brought especially for an attack on the Jews, arrived at Kishineff. The chief instigators of the riots were Kroushvan and his deputy editor, Theo Scherbani; Dr. Sinadino, who is of Greek origin; Dr. Gozylo; the Moldavian engineer Balinski, who is secretary of the Sanitary Bureau; Notoni Pisarzevski, Adam Boinsky, two sons of a prominent merchant named Sverov; two students Malae and Oubranovitz; two Odessa students named Kroupansky; Captains Neclevitz and Birman. The actual leaders of the riots were students and seminarists from the Royal School and the city's religious colleges.

The First Attack on the Jews

"The rioters comprised thirty bands, averaging fifty each, with a seminarist on a bicycle, directing the attack. Some of the bands were composed of the lower employes of the various departments of the municipality. These bands, with sticks and stones, but no firearms, attacked the Jewish quarters at thirty different points simultaneously.

"The majority of the rioters were of Moldavian origin. These Moldavians are as numerous as the Jews in Kishineff, and constitute the most ignorant and brutal element of the populace.

"The Feldstein family was one of the most respectable in Kishineff. The mob attacked their place on the corner of Armenia street, at noon, Sunday, April 9th. The police barracks are 500 yards away. While the mob demolished the premises, the leader found in the kitchen the meat for the family dinner. He put it on a stick, mounted to the roof, and, addressing the mob, declared, 'Here are the remains of a Christian child, found in the house of the wealthy Jew, Feldstein.' The place was utterly demolished, and a safe, containing 25,000 roubles, was robbed.

Horrible Brutalities

"At No. 13 Asia street, twelve families, all Jewish artisans, lived. A mob of Moldavians, some Russian workingmen, and a few Albanians, attacked the occupants of the yard. The majority of the Jewish men escaped, while the sixteen women and girls, concealed themselves in a loft. Four Jewish men tried to defend the place. Mottel Freenspon, was stunned by a blow from a bludgeon, and mutilated while still alive. They, the rioters, choked a child, two years' old, and cut out its tongue while alive. The mob then found its way to the loft where the Jewish women were concealed, and continued their work of slaughter, and worse. At No. 33 Gostinna street, four men and one woman were killed. Sixteen women and eight children were concealed in the loft. The first killed was a boy of sixteen, who begged piteously for life. He was stunned and left for dead. The women and girls in the loft were discovered and assaulted. One woman escaped, and ran to the nearest police station and implored help. The girls in the loft were driven out by the officer, who said the Jews were only receiving what they deserved."

Heartless Russian Officials

These are examples of scores of similar atrocities, equally frightful, which Mr. Davitt mentions with detail. Women and tender children were not spared. There seemed to be no compassion in the mob. While the riot raged the chief of police drove through Kishineff's streets calmly smoking. There is ample evidence that police officials, municipal officers, soldiers and students were among the rioters or encouraging them, although, on the other hand, it is shown that there were many policemen who honestly tried to do their duty and saved many Jewish lives. Mr. Davitt makes one statement which is almost incredible. He says that during the first day's disturbances, while the attack was going on, the Bishop of Kishineff rode through the streets and gave the people his blessing. He uttered no word to persuade the mob to stop its murder and pillage.

The Carousal Story Denied

Mr. Davitt pronounces absolutely untrue the story, circulated by the authorities that the riots started in an insult offered by the Jewish proprietor of a merry-go-round to a Christian woman. He found the owner of the carousal, and he is a Christian German, named Reinhold Mergert. No such incident occurred, Mergert assured him. Mr. Davitt asked Carl Smidt, Mayor of Kishineff concerning the feeling of the Russian people toward the Jews, and the Mayor replied "Our city would be ruined if the Jews left it but if I were a Jew, I confess I would leave Russia."

Mr. Davitt found no evidence to implicate the Government at St. Petersburg in responsibility for the riots, but condemns Minister von Plehwe for not taking precautionary measures, when he knew the attack upon the Jews was contemplated.

No Land for Jews

St. Petersburg, June 4. The Official Messenger states that the Czar has approved the measure drawn up by a committee of ministers forbidding the Jews to acquire land, except in locations within the Jewish pale. Permission is granted to acquire land and settle within this pale in one hundred and one towns.

The BI-CENTENARY of JOHN WESLEY

WHILE Methodists in every land have a peculiar and exceptional right to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Wesley, which occurs on June 28, the right is not exclusive. Churches of all denominations have a heritage of gratitude in the life and work of that wonderful man, and have reason to join his followers in thanking God for sending him into the world. Astonishing as it is, that, out of the movement John Wesley initiated, a church should have developed so numerous, so devoted, so rich in its triumphs in all lands, as the Methodist Church; still more remarkable was the influence of that movement on existing churches. Wesley was ridiculed; he was mobbed; he was denounced; but the power that proceeded from his work, stirred up men of other creeds, and gave an impetus to religious life which was felt around the whole world. Wesley's voice was the bugle note which summoned to active duty the soldiers of the Cross, whatsoever the regiment to which they belonged. They heard, and shaking off the lethargy into which they had fallen, they took up the weapons of their calling, and in their own spheres, went forth to do battle for their Lord. The churches of all names were stirred by the new energy, and shared in the conquests of the time. It is right, therefore, that every church should join in honoring the memory of the man whose call was the means of the general awakening.

The time when Wesley's work began was one of intellectual and spiritual torpidity. The Church of England, of which he was a minister, was sunk in indifference and indolence. Many of the clergy were pluralists, holding several livings at the same time and doing little or no service in return for their emoluments. Some were openly immoral. Thackeray declares that one of the Bishops was so lost to all sense of propriety as to owe his episcopacy to the favor of a notorious courtesan, to whom he paid five thousand pounds for his appointment. Puritanism was discredited and was regarded as dead. Drunkenness and immorality flourished in all ranks of society, unreproved by the clergy. Atheism and ribald conversation were common among rich and poor. Montesquieu, who paid a visit to England about that time, said that religion was laughed at wherever it was mentioned. It seemed as if society in England was drifting into the condition prevailing in France, and that Christianity would be completely buried in unbelief and corruption. Like the valley in which Ezekiel stood in vision, that was full of bones that were very dry, society in that day seemed to be beyond hope of spiritual revival.

Special Qualifications

As at other crises of the church's history, the man to whom the work of reformation and awakening was committed, was a man specially qualified for the work. Perhaps if Wesley had possessed more genius, or learning, or eloquence, he would not have accomplished so much. His very limitations proved helpful in his service. His conservatism, which tried the patience of so many of his ardent followers, was the safeguard of the movement. His readiness to recognize the rights of those who differed with him, more than all, his complete consecration to his work and his abounding energy, combined to render him the man of all men best fitted for the peculiar work of which the time was in need.

The work that Wesley did was less theological than practical. He had no new Gospel to preach; he simply brought the old Gospel with new power into the lives of men. He was impatient with the conflict of mere opinions. Though argumentative and ready at all times to give reasons for his own theological views, it was with disposition and conduct that he was chiefly concerned. "I have no more right," he wrote, "to object to a man for holding a different opinion from me, than I have to differ with a man because he wears a wig and I wear my own hair. But if he takes his wig off and begins to shake the powder about my eyes, I shall consider it my duty to get quit of him as soon as possible." This spirit was reciprocated by Whitefield, in spite of the heated controversy that arose between him and Wesley. Some narrow-minded friend is said to have asked Whitefield if he thought they would meet Wesley in heaven. "Nay," said Whitefield, "John Wesley will be so near the throne that I doubt if we often even catch a glimpse of him."

It was not in Wesley's mind at the outset to form a sect. Even to the last, he clung to the Church of England, and until driven by force of circumstances and the evident need of the societies which had been formed, his conception of his work was rather that of organizing an aid to that church, such as the Society of Jesus was to the Romish Church. His one aim was to save souls and to enthuse them with the spirit of service, that they, too, might go out on the same mission. It was only when he found that the permanence of the work was menaced, that he began to consider church organization. Even then he absolutely excluded dogma as a test of membership. Other churches might do as they would, "Methodists," he wrote, "do not insist on your holding this or that opinion." And again, in the preface to his sermons: "How far is love even with many wrong opinions to be preferred before truth itself without love! We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and yet be carried into Abraham's bosom; but if we die without love, what will knowledge avail?" This is the spirit of modern Christianity and so as Isaac Taylor has said, "Wesley furnished the starting point for our modern religious history in all that is characteristic of the present time."

A Life of Incessant Labor

The events of that busy life have been told so often, that a bare recital of them is all that is necessary here. John was the fifteenth child of Samuel and Susannah Wesley, and was born in the year 1703, on June 17 (old style, which, by legislation, became June 28). His parents had in all nineteen children, of whom two died in infancy. His father was rector of Epworth, in Lincolnshire, England, and his grandfather and great-grandfather had also been clergymen of the English Church. When the boy was six years old the rectory was burned, and he had a narrow escape of perishing in the flames. His godly mother was deeply impressed by the occurrence and consecrated him afresh to God. She superintended his education until he was ready to go to the famous Charterhouse School in London, from which he proceeded to Christ Church College, Oxford. He had a distinguished career at the University and was elected to a fellowship. After taking his degree, he served for a short time as curate for his father; but in 1735 his father died, and the living was given to a stranger. About that time General Oglethorp was settling his Georgia colony, and invited John Wesley and his brother Charles to accompany the colonists as chaplains. They consented, and remained in Georgia a little over two years. But the work was not of the kind that the Wesleys had hoped for, and in 1738 they were back again in England.

The turning-point in John Wesley's career occurred soon after his return. He had been anxious for some time about his own spiritual state, and his acquaintance with some Moravians, who had been on the ship with him on his voyage, had caused him serious uneasiness. He went one day to a meeting in Aldersgate street, London, where he heard Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans read. During the reading, he grasped the truth which Luther had made the keystone of his life, and he entered into spiritual rest and peace which was never afterwards disturbed. He then began to preach with deep earnestness, not seeking a living, but, as he said, regarding the whole world as his parish.

His style of preaching was little likely to find favor with the vicars of that time, and soon the church doors were closed against him. With some reluctance he followed the example of his friend Whitefield, and preached in the open air. Three thousand persons listened to his first sermon, which he preached in a field near Bristol, on Monday, April 2, 1739. Other services followed, and the converts were so numerous that it was decided to build a chapel for the meetings. Before it was finished, a chapel in London, known as the Foundry, was occupied, and a society formed. Rules were made for the regulation of the society and to promote the growth in grace of the members. The germs of the class meeting, the love feast, the watch night and other institutions were inaugurated, and the society grew.

From this time onward to the close of his life Wesley's labors were incessant. It is marvelous that his physical frame was not worn out by travel and preaching. It is estimated that he preached not less than forty-two thousand sermons, an average during fifty years, of fifteen every week. His journeys aggregated a distance of 225,000 miles over bad roads and without regard to weather. The preaching was generally in the open air, and sometimes his audiences numbered from fifteen to twenty thousand persons. Not even when he had passed his eightieth year did he materially relax his efforts.

The Glorious Harvest

The results of the movement showed how ripe the time was for the work, and how sure, even in the most discouraging circumstances, the blessing is when there is real consecration and self-sacrificing devotion. When Wesley died in 1791, there were in Europe no less than 71,688 members of his societies and 294 preachers. In America the number of communicants was 43,265 members, with 217 preachers. Besides all the labor involved in a movement so prodigious, Wesley had found time to edit the Arminian Magazine and to translate several foreign theological works and to edit others. He wrote several important treatises besides the monumental task of preparing his published sermons, one hundred and forty-one in number, which he carefully revised. In addition to these manifold works and the active participation in benevolent and philanthropic enterprises, he might have said with the Apostle Paul, "That which cometh on me daily, the care of all the churches."

It was Wesley's frequent prayer that he "might not live to be useless." It was abundantly granted. In October, 1790, when he was eighty-seven years old, he preached in the open air to an enormous audience at Winchelsea, and the tears of his hearers and their genuine emotion proved that the charm and fervor of the preacher were still in full vigor. His last sermon in his own chapel in London was preached on February 22, 1791, and on the following day he preached in a house eighteen miles away. That was his last service. He was so feeble afterwards that it was evident the end was near. He was taken to his home and the sorrowing friends did all they could for his comfort. Weak as he was he tried to cheer them. Again and again he uttered his favorite phrase, "The best of all is, God is with us." Those were his last words.

American Methodism

How much our own land owes to the movement Wesley initiated can never be calculated. The aggregate of the communicants in the seventeen branches of the Methodist family is over six millions, a far larger number than in his own land. Its first beginning was in the class formed in 1766. Progress at first was slow, and not until Mrs. Barbara Heck induced Philip Embury to resume the preaching he had begun in England, did the movement have a real beginning. With him was associated Captain Webb, a wealthy British officer, and afterwards they were joined by the eloquent Irishman, Robert Strawbridge, under whose preaching the first Methodist revival took place in Maryland. Wesley was appealed to for help, and Thomas Rankin and Francis Asbury came out as missionaries. In 1773 the number of members was 1,160, and a conference was held in Philadelphia, at which ten preachers were present. How the church grew from that time onward, and how it survived attacks from without and seceessions from within, we have not space to tell. For this story, and for the details of John Wesley's life, of which we have given a mere outline, we may refer our readers to the valuable work just published by Messrs. Eaton and Mains of New York, entitled The Methodist, the Bicentennial Life of Wesley, from which, by permission of the publishers, the illustrations on this and the first page have been reproduced.

Fire and Flood

OUR land has lately been undergoing a severe visitation. Seldom, indeed, has a season been marked by such a startling succession of fire flood and storm, as has been experienced during the last few weeks. In the West, the rivers have risen to an almost unprecedented height, heavy rains supplementing the melting of the snows to produce inundations that submerged vast tracts of bottom lands in five States, involving widespread death and devastation. In the South, a tornado has swept a black path through a populous section, leaving the dead and the dying in its wake, and leveling all obstacles that opposed its furious course. In the Middle and Eastern States, destructive forest fires of almost unheard-of magnitude, have obscured the sun and filled the atmosphere with dust, recalling similar phenomena that accompanied the eruption of Pelee.

Happily, the worst is now probably over, and the furious war of the elements, for the time being, is at an end; but weeks must elapse before normal conditions can be fully restored. Meanwhile, thousands of unfortunate men, women and children, who have been made temporarily homeless, are the special wards of the nation. Our people, in many States, with characteristic generosity, have proffered help in such abundance and so promptly, that no apprehensions need be felt for the care and comfort of the sufferers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers have been represented in the relief work, both at Kansas City and Topeka, by contributions which will be promptly and gladly doubled or trebled, should this be needed; but the recuperative forces of our people, even in times like the present, are so vigorous, that there is every reason to hope for an early return to former conditions. In a few weeks, the flood and its tragic accompaniments will be things of the past; but there will ever remain the sad memory of those who sunk in the dark waters, or beneath the tornado's scorching breath. God alone can comfort those whose hearts have been sorely bereaved by these disasters.

A whole nation's sympathy goes out to the sufferers. A nation's resources are at their disposal, until they are rehabilitated and able again to face the battle of life unaided. Let each and every one of us do our share in helping these brothers and sisters in their season of sore affliction.

An Evil and Its Remedy

EVERY Christian will devoutly wish success to the plan proposed by Commander Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army, for the extinction of the feuds in Kentucky, West Virginia, and the adjoining districts. It is a difficult and a discouraging problem. If the hatred existing between families was based on reason, there might be some hope of removing it by reason. Even if it was based altogether on revenge for real or fancied injuries, the prospect of a settlement would be more hopeful, for retaliation must be satisfied after a time. But the feud is practically a race hatred, even though both parties belong to the same race. The members of one family hate the members of another, simply because they belong to the other, and a very slight offence is sufficient to fan the hatred to the murderous pitch. When men are predisposed to quarrel, it is never difficult to find a reason for quarreling. So the feuds have survived from generation to generation, and the peaceable part of the community has been shocked and scandalized by shooting affrays and cold-blooded murders, and has reason to say with Mercutio, "A plague on both your houses."

Commander Booth-Tucker is logical in believing that the surest cure for the evil is the Gospel of Christ, and his proposal is a plan for bringing the Gospel into touch with it. It is essentially a message of love, and therefore the antidote of the passion which has worked the evil. Every truly converted man knows that the change in his nature at the time of his conversion was accompanied by a feeling of peace and love for everyone. Indeed, the awakened sinner has often been kept back from the joy of salvation, for days and weeks, by the fact that he was harboring a dislike or a grudge against some one else. Not until, obeying Christ, he has left the gift of his heart before the altar, and gone out to be reconciled to his brother, has the new sweet life of the Gospel taken possession of him. The sure test of love for God is that a man love his brother also, and we may be quite sure that if a man be brought to love God he will love his brother. The remedy for the feuds being discovered, the problem therefore narrows itself down to the question of how that remedy may be applied. No other way has ever been found but the old way of preaching Christ. Perhaps the Salvation Army may be able to do this more effectually in this particular case than the clergy. It has had some experience in the slums of our cities which may be useful in this field. In any case, the experiment is worth making, for the churches so far have not succeeded. We may be quite sure that there will be no jealousy in the matter, and that the churches will rejoice in the triumph whatsoever the agency may be.

Russia and the Riots

HOWEVER disputing statesmen and diplomats may view the Kishineff affair, it is useless to deny that, at the present moment, Russia's ruler and Government are on trial before the bar of enlightened Christian public opinion. To condemn or approve either side without hearing the other, or weighing the evidence fairly and without prejudice, would be unjust, and not in accord with the true spirit of our Christian civilization.

Ancient as justice itself is the motto: "Hear both sides." As a journal which always strives to be absolutely impartial, and to give to both sides of every case a fair and unprejudiced audience, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, immediately after the Kishineff riots, cabled to the Russian Emperor personally, a request that he should make, through these columns, any statement Russia desired to give to the Western world concerning the massacres.

Recognizing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a religious journal of international scope and circulation, the Emperor has responded, directing his Chief of the Imperial Police in St. Petersburg to prepare the statement. The selection was eminently fitting, as Director Lopoukhine was the high official whom the Emperor sent to Kishineff to restore order, and by whom the anti-Semitic Governor and the local Chief of Police were punished with summary dismissal in disgrace. Director Lopoukhine, therefore, probably knows better than any other Government official in Russia all of the facts concerning the Kishineff atrocities. Side by side with his statement will be found that of Mr. Michael Davitt, who also writes from personal investigation, and, doubtless, from absolutely honest convictions.

We need hardly point out the fact that there are wide and glaring discrepancies in the two statements. Both are given unreservedly, and without any comment of ours, in order that our people may read them carefully and be free to form their own conclusions.

Commencement Days

THE summer of 1903 will be signalized in some of our homes, by the graduation of son or daughter from college, and the return of the dear ones to the home circle. They come back after their four years under academic training like, yet unlike, the children who were so hopefully sent away. Fathers and mothers whose early advantages and opportunities were limited, often make great sacrifices to give their offspring a liberal education. They mean that John and Elizabeth shall start in the race with as few handicaps as possible, that whatever books and teachers can do for them shall be done without stint. If father looks older and grayer than ever, his shoulders more stooping, his hands more horny with toil, when his boy comes home, the reason is not far to seek. It has taken work to pay the bills, to scrape together the fees, to dress the lad as well as the rest, while he has been gone. If mother's gown is shabby, if she has no style in her old-fashioned hat, and her gloves and shoes are the worse for wear, she has not felt herself a martyr, for her bonny daughter has been kept in the front rank.

The young people have their chance now to scatter sunlight in the home, to make it more redolent of "little acts of kindness, little words of love," than ever before. They have gained a good deal of the lore of books. They are as yet untutored in the lore of life. Very soon most of them will leave the parental roof for other study, other tasks. The boys must find work in business or profession, very few of them finding a niche just where their fathers are. Many of the girls are looking forward to self-support, they do not yet know in what line, but they have hope, pluck, energy, ambition. The good education, the excellent training, will not be wasted, nor diffused as aroma in the atmosphere. Somehow it will be put to good account. As for the diploma, framed on the wall, or laid away in the bureau, the graduate will soon forget about it. Precious to-day, it is a mere stepping-stone on the road, worth little when passed over.

But the college associations and friendships, as time drifts by, will be more than ever valuable. Nothing else is sweeter than the fellowship, the comradeship of the school, when school-days are far in the dim distance. Two middle-aged people meet, clasp hands, gaze into each other's eyes. Presently a smile breaks like dawn over each face. The light of other days renews the youth in their souls. They are Max and Bert, Madge and Kitty; they are boys again, they are girls once more. Class reunions are jolly occasions for years and years, until the narrowing lines, the vanished faces, make them pathetic.

Blessings on the young people who are putting on new honors in the schools of law and medicine and theology. These are they who shall take the places of those who are worn out by the long day's burden and heat. These are they who shall perform the great surgical operations and preach the great legal victories bye and bye.

Among the many who shall be billeted as brilliant and promising at commencement this summer, only a scattered few shall reap the golden harvests or receive the vast rewards. But blessed are the obscure pathways and hallowed are the homely tasks. Commonplace people are most of us, with commonplace work to do, and it needs to be recorded of us only that we did what we could, as in the great Taskmaster's eye. "Each for the joy of the doing," working not for money, not for fame, not for any visible or invisible reward, each faithful and true, each honest and brave, we shall hear the "Well Done" some day.

Our love goes out to every graduate in all our schools, our felicitations go to the proud fathers and mothers.

Fighting Forest Fires

The unprecedented drought of May was the occasion of most alarming fires in the North Woods and elsewhere. These fires are caused by the carelessness of campers or fishermen, by smokers, who heedlessly fling a half-extinguished match down among dry bush, or by sparks from passing railway trains. Once such fires gain headway it is difficult to put them out; they sweep in red wrath and wild flame over leagues and acres, devastating as they go. Men fight them night and day, fight fire with burning brands that hem a lurid scene and shut it in, fight to keep flame confined to a single area, rather than to let it spread. Should we fight other evils as men fight these forest fires, a mighty improvement would soon take place in human affairs.

—OUR CHILDREN'S HOME at Mont-Lawn will open for the season in the latter part of this month. We invite all of our readers to have a share in this benevolent work. It costs $3 to give a tenement child a ten-days' outing. In no other way can you invest so small a sum where it will bring such abundant and blessed results.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Gainesville Disaster

SELDOM has destruction, more sudden and complete, fallen upon a town in late years than that which desolated the city of Gainesville, Ga., on June 1. Soon after noon a storm struck the city, driving people from the streets into houses and stores. The sky grew dark, and in a few minutes a fierce tornado approached with a terrific roar. The southern part of the city was the first to feel its impact. Houses rocked and reeled, and as the storm went on, it seemed to gather force. As it passed through the city some houses were torn into fragments, others were lifted from their foundations and carried bodily across the street, roofs were stripped off and blown several blocks, heavy machinery was taken up and flung aside like straws, railroad cars were driven from the tracks, and people were lifted from their feet and carried over fences or dashed against walls. The tornado struck the cotton mill in which about five hundred persons are employed. It was a three-story structure full of busy life. In less than five minutes it was an utter wreck. The second and third stories were completely demolished and the first story was badly damaged. The wind was accompanied by a deluge of rain and the sky was black as night. In a few minutes the rain ceased and the sun shone on a scene of ruin and desolation. The people who were unhurt, at once set to work to rescue those who had been buried under the ruins and many imperilled lives were saved. More than eighty persons, however, had been killed outright, and about one hundred and fifty were so seriously injured as to be in danger of collapse. The greatest loss of life occurred at the cotton mills, in which, it is believed, thirty-six persons perished. About two hundred houses were completely destroyed, leaving fully eight hundred persons homeless. A calamity, so sudden and so overwhelming, shows how feeble man is, with all his resources, when the mighty forces of nature march upon him. Even in this boastful century, the reverent attitude of the Hebrew prophet before the Creator, who controls the elements, is the only becoming one for his creatures.

For, lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind, and declareth unto man what is his thought, that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth, The Lord, The God of hosts, is his name (Amos 4: 13).

New York's Yellow Day

It is many years since the people of the metropolis witnessed such strange atmospheric conditions as those which prevailed on June 4. At first, the appearance was that of a dense fog. From the Battery to the city line beyond the Bronx, and from the Hudson to the outmost parts of Brooklyn, the whole city was enveloped in mist. On Broadway, it was impossible to see more than a dozen blocks, while along the water front, the Jersey coast and the Long Island shore, were as completely shut off from the vision as if they had never existed. On the Battery only the dimmest outlines of Governors, and Ellis Islands could be seen, while Staten Island was as completely hidden as if it were in the mid-Atlantic. In Central Park, life was made miserable for driver and pedestrian, and the grass and flowers there, looked as if they had been daubed with yellow paint, owing to the peculiar reflection. The mystery was solved by the strange sensation experienced by everyone out-of-doors, of the smarting of the eyes, which indicated that it was not fog, but smoke, that was lying like a pall over the city. It made the sun look like a ball of copper, and gave the high buildings a weird appearance. The phenomenon was due to the forest fires in the Catskills, the Adirondacks, and the Maine and New Hampshire woods, which the northwest wind brought to the city. In past times so weird a phenomenon would have caused widespread alarm, but no one was scared, because the cause was understood. But the Bible warns us that the time will come when such a sign will portend a conflagration in which the whole world will be involved.

I will show wonders in the heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood and fire, and vapor of smoke (Acts 2: 19).

Identified by a Ring

A press dispatch from Butte, Mont., tells a remarkable story of the discovery of a long lost girl. More than a year ago, a young man arrived in Montana from Sweden. He settled near Butte and has prospered. During his residence in this country he has been making inquiries at every opportunity as to the fate of a girl cousin who came to America with her parents nearly twenty years ago. He said that a large fortune was awaiting the girl at Stockholm, which had been left by a relative to whom she was the nearest heir. The girl had been carried off by Indians soon after she and her parents settled in Montana. The parents were killed by the Indians, but the child was spared. No trace of her, however, could be found, and the young man had given up hope of ever finding her. One day recently he was at Kalispell, when a number of Crees went through the town. He noticed one of the women, who was conspicuous by her auburn hair. He questioned her, and she told him that she belonged to a white race, but she knew nothing of her name or nationality. She had been stolen when a child and had been with the Indians ever since. The young man suspected that she was his long lost cousin, but there was still a doubt, until the girl recollected that she possessed one solitary relic of her childhood. This was a child's ring, which she produced. On the inside was an inscription which she could not read. The young man, however, could read it and was delighted to find it was the name of his cousin. She will now return to Sweden and claim the fortune awaiting her. One can but wish that when men are told that they are sons of God and that a heritage of glory is waiting for them, they would do as this girl did—quit the people who have carried them away captive from their Father's house and take the place that is offered to them.

Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God (Eph. 2: 19).

A Persistent Wooer

The marriage is announced of a couple in Jersey City, N. J., who have suffered a long series of disappointments. The bridegroom is an engineer on board a vessel which hails from a southern port. For ten years past, when it has been at New York, the engineer has gone to Jersey City to see the girl with whom he fell in love as a youth, and to renew his offer of marriage. The girl seems to have been sincerely attached to him; but when he first proposed to her, the objection was made by her parents that she was too young to be married. The wooer bowed to their decision, and after waiting a year, renewed his suit. The girl's parents again insisted on delay. At the end of his next voyage the young man re-appeared and begged for the third time that the marriage might be celebrated; but again there was a difficulty in the way. Nine times in all he pleaded his cause at intervals of about six months or a year, before consent was given; and then by an irony of circumstances, he was, himself, unable to be married, being summoned away unexpectedly on an urgent voyage. On his return, recently, he made his tenth proposal, which has been successful. One cannot but be glad that a lover so persistent should have won at the last. Unhappily, it is not always so with those whose love and faithfulness God condescends to seek. He has often reason to complain of them as he did of his ancient people.

Notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking, but ye hearkened not unto me (Jer. 35: 14).

A Death Toilet

A cablegram from the Austrian capital describes the pathetic scene at the death of a famous opera singer, whose voice had charmed audiences in all the European capitals. She was only twenty-nine years old, and it was believed that she had a great career before her. Some months ago, however, she was stricken down with a disease which was pronounced fatal. She cancelled all her engagements, and notified her American manager that she could not hope to fulfil her promise to cross the Atlantic. The end came on June 4. At midnight she asked that she be removed from her bed to an armchair, and that she be dressed in the costume of her favorite character in "La Traviata." Having said farewell to her husband and relatives the room was brilliantly illuminated at her request, and her brother played Mendelssohn's "Fruehlingslied" on the piano. The dying woman followed the music with her voice until with the words "earth to earth" she fell forward to the floor, dead. It was a strange desire, to recall in the solemn hour of death, the garish scenes of the mimic stage. One would have thought that on the threshold of the eternal world, other thoughts than those would have been more appropriate. There would have been more comfort for her in the faith which the prophet put in him, who has said:

I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death (Hosea 13: 14).

BRIEF NOTES

The skull of Dr. James Chalmers, which was recovered after his murder by cannibals, has been interred at Dara, New Guinea.

The Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia, who some time ago prohibited intoxicating liquor in his dominions, has caused two of his generals to be arrested for drinking gin.

It is significant that the English language was used recently by the Emperor of China, when he telegraphed his condolence to the Emperor of Japan on the death of Prince Komatsu.

Rev. J. E. Hannington, son of the famous martyred Bishop, has resigned his living and has entered the service of the Church Missionary Society. He asks to be sent to labor in Uganda, where his illustrious father was murdered.

Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, the successor of Dr. Parker as pastor of the City Temple, London, is now on his way to this country. It is expected that he will reach New York on June 20. His first services will be in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the recent annual meeting of the China Inland Mission it was stated that there is a widespread desire for Western education and an unparalleled demand for Western books, including the Bible, now current in China. The Bible Society there issued last year, from its Shanghai depot, 1,084,200 copies. The income of the Mission for the year amounted to $535,535.

An appropriate Bi-centenary volume is that of extracts from John Wesley's Journal, which has been prepared by Percy Livingstone Parker. It contains the choicest parts of the four bulky volumes in which the work has been published. It is a book of 212 pages, price $1.50, and is published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, Fifth avenue, New York.

An Interdenominational Bible Conference will be held at Lake Orion, Mich., July 31 to August 7. Addresses will be given by Dr. C. I. Scofield, Professor Robert W. Rogers, Rev. [illegible] Woelfkin, Rev. E. C. Dexter, of the China Inland Mission, and others. A Sunday School Department will be conducted by Professor W. C. Pearse of Chicago. Young [illegible] who will take part are Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Major [illegible] Cole and Dr. W. H. Marquess. "LINKED TO THE FIRING-LINE"

By JOHN WILLIS BAER

TO deepen the missionary spirit in the church is one of the privileges, as well as one of the problems, with which many Missionary Boards are wrestling. Methods of one kind and another are planned, pushed for awhile, and then withdrawn. Many of these, in my opinion, are but "makeshifts," and have no permanent or lasting effect in kindling a missionary fire that shall glow with real life. Therefore, I am impatient with the use of any method that will not deepen the motive; for what the church needs to-day is not more method but more motive.

In late years, comparatively, a number of the Mission Boards of several denominations have strenuously urged churches, societies and individuals to rally to the support of one or more missionaries at home or abroad, and the general plan has, on the whole, met with favor by all parties concerned. By far the largest number of missionaries commissioned by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions are being supported by churches, societies, or individuals. The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has, also, with vigor bound many churches to the firing-line by living links. Other denominations, too, have, to a less or greater degree, presented this same method to their churches, and the campaign for "missionary substitutes" is now considered popular. Whether this plan will succeed as a permanent method for deepening the missionary motive among the churches, I am not able to say now. I desire more experience. I am, however, at present enthusiastically in favor of giving it a generous trial. If it wins ultimately, it will be because the plan is projected as a tool, not a toy. At present it has reached the popular stage. It is by some considered a fad, a novelty, and therefore scratches only the surface of missionary interests.

There are some wise missionary leaders already outspoken in opposition to the method as a method. Some missionaries do not like the idea, and object to being "farmed out" to churches as "specials." Some missionaries are not successes, and the disappointment to a church is a shock to the missionary enthusiasm of the church. Then, from the standpoint of the Boards, some think that the practice narrows the responsibility of the Boards to whom money is entrusted, that it shuts out many from having a part in the general work, and that it also narrows the view of the church, centering their outlook upon a personality instead of increasing their belief in a principle. We will all do well to give the whole plan careful consideration, and, as I have intimated, so far, I am becoming more and more in favor of the practice, because I see that it is emphasizing a splendid principle. Let me, therefore, tell the story of how one church has actually deepened its missionary spirit, widened its outlook, and opened its purse in consequence.

Five years ago, the First Presbyterian Church of Mount Vernon, New York, Rev. Charles Stoddard Lane, pastor, was contented with the usual plan of an "annual offering," for Home and Foreign Missions, and gave about three or four hundred dollars to Foreign Missions. The wide-awake pastor, impatient of anything but the best, then proposed that the church "have a missionary of its own," and when the pastor presented the plan, it met with instant favor. The proposition was made to take the collection for Foreign Missions in the form now followed as a subscription on the envelope plan, each individual pledging a sum of money to be paid each week for twelve weeks. The amount pledged in the new way was over $1,000, instead of the $440 given the year before, in the old manner. The church at once, and by a rising vote, accepted Rev. Llewellyn J. Davies as its "missionary pastor." Mr. Davies was then at work in Chinanfu, China, in West Shantung. He is thirty-seven years old, a graduate with honors of Lake Forest and McCormick. Part of his theological course was taken at Hartford. He went out to Chinanfu in 1892. The death of a little child and Mrs. Davies' poor health, brought them home somewhat earlier than they would otherwise have come, so that they were in this country at the time of the Boxer troubles.

CHAS. STODDARD LANE J. D. STORMONT GABINO RENDON LLEWELLYN J. DAVIES

FOUR MISSIONARIES WHO ARE SUPPORTED IN THE FIELD BY A PROGRESSIVE CHURCH

Mr. Davies was located first after his return in Chefoo, but in December, 1902, was transferred to Tsingtao, to succeed Mr. Bergen, who was made head of Shantung College. Mr. Davies made a strong impression on the Mount Vernon Church when he was here, as a man of character and ability, as well as thorough consecration to the work, and ever since his becoming a missionary pastor in China, the church has followed him with its prayers as well as its gifts. His letters and reports are read with interest at the meetings at the home church. The church feels that Mr. Davies really belongs to them, and consider his field as important as the Mount Vernon field.

Not satisfied with the missionary advance and with one missionary pastor in China, the Mount Vernon church on last Easter Sunday, pledged twelve hundred dollars in addition to what it had been doing, and after consultation with the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, the church now has two additional missionary pastors, helping to win America for Christ.

The Rev. J. D. Stormont, of Nephi, Utah, and the Rev. Gabino Rendon, of Santa Fe, New Mexico, are the two new men in whom the Mount Vernon church is now especially interested. Already the reflex influence from this new relationship, has intensified the interest in missions among the members of the Mount Vernon church. They are more interested in the menace that Mormonism is to the religion of Jesus Christ than they could possibly be, if it was not for the fact that their own missionary is face to face with the hard and difficult problems to be found in every Utah field.

It is also easily understood why the Mount Vernon church believes more than it ever did in mission school work, as it is carried on in New Mexico, and Arizona. Their new pastor — on the field—the Rev. Gabino Rendon, is a product of one of those mission schools. He was born in New Mexico, studied for a while in the mission school, served the church as an evangelist, in Colorado; and for several years has been aggressively at work in the Spanish work in Santa Fe, and vicinity. Mr. Rendon's associates have thought so much of him that he was elected moderator of the Santa Fe Presbytery. In addition to his work in Santa Fe, he has oversight of the churches in Chimayo, thirty miles away; Las Tucas, twelve miles farther on; Santa Barbara, twenty miles from Santa Fe, and Embudo, as far in another direction.

Another reason for giving my hearty approval to the missionary substitute plan, is that the missionaries believe in this plan. Mr. Rendon writes:

> After learning of this new relationship, it was the most natural thing to remember the Mount Vernon church and pastor and the two other fellow-workers in Utah and China in our family worship. May God bless us all in doing his own work. This new plan doubtless will also be an incentive to strong churches to support missionaries, and it must make them feel that they have a closer connection with the particular mission field. For my part, to know that certain people have the same interest that I have in my field of labor, and that they have us, both labor and laborer, constantly before the Throne of Grace, is a source of strength. Of course, we all have at heart the work at large, but we have a particular interest in what we call our own work.

Along that same line Mr. Stormont wrote, when he heard that he had been adopted by the Mount Vernon church:

> We are glad, personally, to be chosen as the representatives in Utah of the Mount Vernon church, and aside from that, we are glad that the church is identifying itself with individual missionaries, for this is certainly the ideal relationship.

Christian Endeavors will be interested to know that Mrs. Stormont, for a number of years Treasurer of the Mississippi State Union, in the new field of labor is a true helpmeet and worker.

The facts, then, briefly boiled down, are these: The Mount Vernon church a few years ago was giving but a few hundred dollars to the missions, and that the result of an annual appeal. It is now giving to two Boards for three missionaries, one in China, one in Utah, and one in New Mexico, $2,500. It does this willingly, and I may add, also easily. These workers have a relationship to the church that seems to me to be ideal. The names of the three men are printed on the weekly church bulletin as the "missionary pastors" of the church on the firing-line. What this church has done, other churches can do, and the results of this church's interest and experiences with this new plan of having its "missionary substitutes," make me earnest in my advocacy of the practice and the principle. These people have not taken up with a fad or a novelty; and while I am not a prophet, yet I believe that in the days to come they will be doing much more than this, and that the next steps in the coming years will be as great, by comparison, as the ones that have already been taken. Therefore, I pray that this example may be an incentive to other churches to start along similar lines, thus deepening their missionary spirit and consecration, and giving them a wider outreach in helping Jesus Christ win this whole world to himself.

CHRIST IN THE CITY*

The Work of the City Missionary a Necessity in Modern Life

FEW people have any idea of the heathenism there is in the great cities of our land. Life there is so hard, the hours of labor are so long, the competition is so fierce, that the struggle for mere existence absorbs the energies and leaves the worker indisposed for anything but relaxation and amusement. These are provided so freely and in such variety that religion is elbowed out of the life of many a man and woman. Immigration, too, has had its part in the materializing of life. The bulk of the immigrants of recent years have come from districts of Europe in which the religion of Christ is little known. They bring with them their superstitions and their unbelief, and in the strange associations in which they find themselves, they have no desire to enter a church. It is necessary to go out, not as in Judea into the highways and hedges, but into the slums and the tenement houses to find them and tell them of Christ. This can be done and is being done by the city missionary, whose work is most arduous and is little recognized. It is well that the societies of young people should give him some thought. He is doing more for the cause of Christ than the church has any conception of. Day in and day out he is among the tenements, comforting the sick and the sorrowing and the bereaved, and using the opportunity to plead the cause of the great Burden-bearer. All honor to such men! Their services, known only to their Master in heaven, will receive at his hands a reward which will never fade.

General Howard's Long Ride From Squabble Creek to the Lincoln College at Cumberland Gap

CUMBERLAND GAP, TENN., May, 1903.

THE improvements made in Squabble Creek by the work of a teacher, in the establishment, first, of a school for week-days, and for Sundays; and then, the fulfilling the promise of building a Log College of rge size, constitute an object lesson which you will be glad contemplate. The best part of the work is this: the set- ers for ten miles around from Mr. John Gross' store, have ot only taken an intent interest in the enterprise, but they ave given land and lumber, and helped on the construction the buildings in every way they could; using their horses, ules and oxen. They have in their plan, a dormitory—the tchen of which is already erected—to accommodate pupils ho are too far off for daily attendance.

As soon as I had finished my first letter to THE CHRISTIAN ERALD, Mr. Chamberlin and I, with a guide, rode from ross' store to Hyden, Leslie county. It was a hard ride, ver the roughest of mountain roads and ranges, following, owever, mainly the Middle Fork of the Kentucky River. he soil varies in the narrow valleys and along the main bed the stream. Where the soil is good, and the valley reason- ly broad, the farmers are comparatively well-to-do. There ere children at every house, and the people seemed to unt largely upon the school privi- ges that are every day, more and ore coming to them. We found me families, where there was sick- ss, but the cases were very few; as rule the people were healthful all ong the route. Whole families were the fields—the latter being general- so steep along the side of the foot- lls that it was difficult to plough or arrow. Horsemen would come long with us for miles, and converse bout the development of the coun- y. They told us of the vast possi- ilities of this rugged region, and were clined to think that knowledge and oney were all that was needed. We elt that they lacked good roads. Horses and mules could get along owly, wearying themselves and their ders; but wagons were a rarity, and uggies or light wagons impossible, ith present roadways. We could ee that railroads were necessary to evelop the country; but when we aid so to a farmer or lumberman, he ould answer that the railway charges ore than counterbalanced their ad- antage to the people.

During the second day from Gross' o Hyden, a journey of twenty-three iles, we stopped to dine at a Mr. Na- ier's house. He was a young man of reat energy and had a nice little amily around him. When we came o settle our bill for a dinner (we had n our party for the time being a Mr. ewis, a lawyer from Hyden), Mr. Napier took fifteen cents a piece for ur dinners, but declared that Mr. ewis must not pay. Mr. Napier ade it a rule, as he declared, that no an living in the same county (Les- e county) should ever pay him for a eal.

At night we came to Jack Lewis's. He and his family were accustomed to keep strangers over ight, and here we had as generous entertainment as the ountry affords. There is, however, a sameness in the food upply throughout the mountain region. At this season, he usual abundance of fowl is not forthcoming, and there s only salt meat and the usual corn-bread, relieved by some ort of preserves, often two or three kinds. We saw none f the ordinary soft bread, such as we have at home. Coffee nd tea were always fairly good, and the home-made sugars nd syrups, from the sorghum, which the people raise, were n the table. The butter was as white as milk and had on hardness. With very little experience in good cooking, one would say, "Is it not possible for the women to be taught to ook bread and meat in a better way?"

In many places we found very soft hot biscuits, quite oggy. Fellow-travelers from the mountains relished these greatly, especially when thoroughly saturated with butter. One could hardly conceive of anything in the line of food more likely to create dyspepsia.

The first day, after eight hours and a half in the saddle, we ame to Mr. Ebersole's, and were very kindly entertained here for the night. A Presbyterian missionary, Mr. Salmond, ecognized us, and afforded us every opportunity to gather uch facts as we were seeking with regard to this mountain ounty of Leslie. Hyden is the only town of any consider- able size in the county. Missionaries have introduced and maintained a good school for some time. They have sent out many teachers, and here a convention of teachers was in session during our visit. The teachers were examined during this meeting by some central committee, and if they passed favorably, were sent out all through the county to different fields of labor. This county supervision struck me as very appropriate and progressive. General Howard, by special request, addressed the people at the Court House.

With a new set of mules and a guide, we at last were able to leave the warm-hearted people of Hyden and proceeded on our way. As soon as we had crossed the divide, we were for a time in Harlan county. Here we found several soldiers of the Forty-Ninth Kentucky; one of them very ill. He was just recovering from pneumonia. It cost him twenty-five dollars for a single visit of a physician from Pinesville, distant eighteen miles. He could afford but one such visit.

A little farther on, we talked with Lieutenant Forrester of the same regiment. He was greatly interested in the great leaders during the rebellion. More literary than his neighbors, he had read all the books he could get hold of, and evidently was a man much respected by these neighbors.

A GROUP OF THE GIRL STUDENTS IN GRANT LEE HALL

He had aided many a pensioner, but now that he was himself crippled, as I saw, he could get no pension. I asked him what was the trouble. He said that the regiment had lost its hospital record and there was no way to prove the facts in his case. It seems a pity that so worthy and deserving a man as Lieutenant Forrester cannot have the pension which he so sorely needs.

About midway of this day's journey we rested at Mr. Mack Howard's. His daughter, Mrs. Anderson, provided the best meal we had had in the mountains. After refreshment and rest, we rode the next twelve or thirteen miles to Pineville. Two miles above Pineville is a little settlement of coal miners strung along the creek. The settlement itself is called "Straight Creek." We could but wish that the place had a better knowledge of hygiene, for its sewerage was fearful. Notwithstanding pure air and abundant good water, filth had accumulated, and the children seemed to mingle with the "razor-backs," the ducks and the geese in their enjoyment.

From Pineville, Mr. Adam Feltner, at 4 A. M., started to return with our outfit of horses and mules, and we came on by rail in about an hour's time to the "Harrowgate" station. Met by several students of the Lincoln Memorial University, Mr. Chamberlin and I were royally escorted to the Grant-Lee Hall. We said, as we entered the hall—after glancing about over the broad lands and—"Could there be anything more beautiful than this?" The farm, the trees sparkling in the morning light, the cattle feeding in the meadow, the bee garden, filled with growing vegetables, the grass well up, and the surrounding grasses resonant with every variety of bird-music, produced an impression which will always be with us when we think of this place.

The Grant Lee Hall is filled with students of both sexes, and so also is the Harrow Hall, near the college of Cumberland Gap. The students altogether number over three hundred. From the front porch or gallery of the great hall, I have never in my life seen a more beautiful landscape. My friends say at once, "It is the most charming one I ever witnessed." The crops planted and sowed this year are extensive—over one hundred acres, and all put in by student labor. The Hall itself is a perfect bee hive of activity, every body cheerful, hopeful and active. The President, Dr. Lamy, says that in the five years just we have never accomplished as much as this year. Our extensive gardens are all in order, planted by the young men, and the work of the young women is just as real. They do the cooking for the different messes. They have several industries besides, such as the making of mattresses, dresses of different kinds, basket work, and what not. The industrial division includes photography, printing, typewriting, stenography and whatever belongs to domestic science. The building appears at times to be filled with music, and the mountain youth surely love music. The President's daughter, Alice, has a way of teaching this branch that is wonderfully successful. She has pupils not only at Grant Lee Hall, but at Cumberland Gap also.

The saw mill, shingle mill and planing mill are busy, doing work for the University and for neighbors, with a reasonable profit therefrom. The University management has now added a corn mill, which is especially useful to the whole community. When I notice the growing grain in the finest condition, the extensive garden with all sorts of vegetables, and the grasses, especially the clover, more abundant than ever before, I think of what Dr. Pearson said in his first letter concerning this region, to wit, "You will teach them to make two spears of grass grow where there is now but one." This is already being realized.

The new Girls' Dormitory is not yet completed, but the great auditorium on the lower story and its rough posts covered, and its walls decorated with flowers. The blue and the gray appeared here and there most comfortably, but in beautiful festoons, and Lincoln's motto, "With charity for all," was over the main stage. Rough benches had been improvised by using the unused flooring of other rooms. We had a capital orchestra organized, and conducted by Miss Alice Lamy. The performance showed wonderful training as well as native talent of the first order. The Shakespearean play, Twelfth Night, was admirably acted, not put on the stage as a complete play, but so arranged that all the main parts and characters were thoroughly supported. Miss Gomburg had charge of arrangement and teaching, and it was a marvel to me, and to my friends, that so much could have been accomplished in so short a time.

Our Congregational church at Cumberland Gap was crowded to the overflowing the first night, at the closing exhibition of the lowest grade of the institution. Almost forty children took part, and I could see that very faithful work had been done by the principal instructor, Prof. Amerine, and the teachers associated with him at Harrow Hall. On the second night, the church was again overcrowded to hear essays, declamations and discussions by students of a higher grade, and the fidelity of a year's work was again manifest. When General Howard was called on to speak, thinking that the people were weary enough from the long and close packing, he confined his remarks to asking the audience to rise and sing "America."

It is a beautiful ride from the church to Grant Lee Hall, over the macadamized roads recently completed. Col. Wessels, of New York left for the example and the benefit of these mountain people. Our wagonette was filled with a merry set of friends, and the singing en route was delightful.

The Growth of the Church

Review of Paul's Lifework

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 28

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: THE LORD SHALL DELIVER ME FROM EVERY EVIL WORK AND WILL PRESERVE ME UNTO HIS HEAVENLY KINGDOM.—II. TIM. 4:18

THE banyan tree has a growth peculiar to itself, by which it becomes a whole grove of trees, all connected with the main trunk. This it does by sending out slender fibres from its branches, which descend to the ground and become rootlets; then the growth is reversed, the slender fibres being fed by the roots until it grows to a size sometimes rivaling the main trunk. This process goes on until acres are covered. One famous banyan grew into a forest covering thirteen acres. The tree has useful and medicinal qualities. Let us take this banyan tree as an illustration of the growth of the Christian Church. In imagination or fact, let us draw a map taking the several trunks of the tree to represent the places where the Gospel took root as Paul and his fellow-laborers journeyed through Asia into Europe. The main trunk is the church at Jerusalem, planted by our Lord himself, which, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, grew until the main trunk included Samaria and all Palestine. When Barnabas went to Antioch, the tree put forth another slender stem, which had a rapid and strong growth, for almost the whole city was brought under the influence of the Gospel through the work of Barnabas, assisted by Paul. The "rootlets" were nourished by their house-to-house visitation. The Antioch branch grew until it extended over the island of Cyprus, and slender stems of influence descended to Salamis and Paphos and intermediate places. Another branch extended over into Asia, and stems grew downward and touched Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. In the providence of God the great Gospel tree was growing toward Europe and presently stems of influence descended upon Philippi and Thessalonica and Berea, in the visits of Paul and his associates. And then a branch grew towards Greece and touched Athens and Corinth, which last became one of the great trunks. Then in Asia Minor other branches put forth. At Ephesus there grew a great church. A small filament dropped down to the island of Crete, which gained some strength when placed under the care of Titus by Paul. And then towards Italy the tree pushed its life. A slender separated stem took root in the Island of Melita, and was nourished by the Apostle Paul as he preached the Gospel and healed the sick during the three months of his enforced stay, waiting for some ship, by which he might be conveyed to Rome. Paul came at last to Rome, and at his coming the Gospel tree put forth a slender stem, which dropped into a prison, where loving hearts helped it grow until it became at last a great trunk, rivaling the parent tree at Jerusalem. Still the tree grew westward until it reached Spain, and all along the seacoast towns we can seem to see it taking root under the guiding influence of the Apostle Paul. We look toward Asia again, and see the Gospel branches descending upon Smyrna and Thyatira, upon Sardis and Philadelphia, upon Pergamos and Laodicea, until these together with Ephesus, became the seven churches of Asia—seven great trunks of such importance that the Lord Jesus sent messages to them as he spoke in a vision to the Apostle John on the Island of Patmos.

And so the Gospel tree spread until it covered the whole known world. We can scarcely number the multitudes that rested under its shade, for the membership of the church increased by thousands every week. Nor can we estimate the healing which was found in the leaves of this Gospel-tree for the heartaches and wrongs of men.

THE BANYAN-LIKE SPREAD OF CHRISTIANITY BY PAUL'S LABORS

How this tree has grown since Paul's time! We are told that in Japan there are certain trees of great age which are greatly cherished, being regarded with veneration that is akin to affection. So the great extent and great age of the church impel us to sing:

I love the Church, O God, her walls before me stand
Dear as the apple of thine eye, engraven on thy hand.

That all things in nature are manifestly working together toward perfection as their end, as science reveals, proves that there was an idea beforehand, and if an idea a MIND. As men and machines, working separately on the many minute parts of a watch are really co-operating under a master mind to produce the complete watch, so God is using men and things, friends and foes, rain and shine, to bring men to heaven, and to bring heaven to men, in fulfilment of his plan of love and law. Like microscopic fish we move freely as in a drop of ocean, but are carried forward, even when they swim backward, in God's gulf stream of providential history.

Reminiscences of Paul's Friends and Associates

The Elders of the Church at Ephesus: That was a memorable day we spent with Paul at Miletus, whither we went from Ephesus. The seashore was our meeting-place, because we were in expectation that Paul's vessel might sail at any hour. Paul warned us against the influence of certain false teachers, who would lead the people from the truth, urging us to study God's Word ourselves, and to induce the people to do the same, that we might not be deceived.

Members of the Church at Corinth: A letter from the Apostle Paul, was indeed a glad event in our church life. The whole church gathered to hear it read by these brethren in turn. Paul had been apprised of dissensions among us, and this was the occasion of the letter. His great desire was, that we should be one in Christ, and that we should be pure, and act towards each other as brothers in Christ. He desired, also, that we should know the doctrine of the resurrection, and so rest our souls in peace and hope.

Members of the Church at Rome: We had not yet seen the face of Paul when his letter to us was brought by Phœbe, a distinguished woman in the church at Corinth. It was Paul's expectation to be in Rome shortly, and he wished to prepare us for the truth he would teach us at his coming.

Paul's Traveling Companions: There were eight of us who accompanied Paul as he sailed away from Miletus, namely, Sopater, from Berea; Aristarchus and Secundus, from Thessalonica; Gaius and Timotheus, from Derbe; Tychicus and Trophimus, from Ephesus. Each of us had charge of the funds contributed by our home churches for the benefit of suffering Christians in Jerusalem. Besides, there was Luke, the beloved physician, who had been with Paul on many journeys before. We were nearly two months on the way to Jerusalem, from March 27 to May 17. Many precious hours we had with Paul as he read the Bible to us, and taught us concerning its prophecies, and their fulfilment in the life and death of Jesus Christ.

Claudius Lysias, the Roman Captain: My first sight of Paul was when he was being beaten and stoned by the Jewish mob in the court of the Temple. I came upon him with a rescuing party of soldiers from the Castle Antonia. But for this, he would soon have been a dead man. When on the stairs leading into the castle he asked my permission to speak to the people. I did not at once acquiesce, for I had an idea that he might be that Egyptian who had been making a disturbance among the Jews in the province over which Felix was Governor. But when Paul assured me of his identity as a Jew of Tarsus, I gave him liberty to speak. As I listened to his words, he seemed to me like a fanatic. But he had a very stirring effect upon the crowd below. They soon began to show signs of renewed violence, and I hurried my prisoner into the castle. I must acknowledge that I made a mistake when I ordered him to be scourged. I quickly countermanded the order when I was told by him that he was a Roman citizen. I yielded to the demand of the Jewish leaders that he should appear before them to be tried. But a second time I had to rescue him, or he would have been pulled in pieces by them. A few hours afterward, I formed a sudden determination to get my prisoner out of Jerusalem, because of the information brought to me by a young man that a league of forty persons had been formed to take the life of my prisoner. I sent him with an escort of 470 men, under cover of the night, to Felix.

Felix, Governor of Judea: When I had read the letter sent to me by the chief captain, I ordered that Paul should be brought before me. After a brief examination I sent him to the judgment hall to await the coming of his accusers. After five days they came, bringing with them an attorney, who hurt their case more than he helped it, by bringing charges which could not be proved. When I gave the man permission to speak in his own defence, his straightforward manner impressed me in his favor, and I determined to withhold a decision until the chief captain might himself come down to Cesarea. I could not release the prisoner, but I gave him all possible liberty, not binding him with chains, and permitting his friends to freely visit him. There was a charm about the man that impelled me to send for him again and again, simply that I might hear him talk. He did not hesitate to reprove me for what seemed to him evi in my life. It was hard to withstand him when he reasone before me. My only refuge was to dismiss him, saying tha I would hear him again at some more convenient seaso For two years he was my prisoner, and then I went out o office. I did not wish to make enemies of the Jews, as should have done by releasing him, so I left him in bonds.

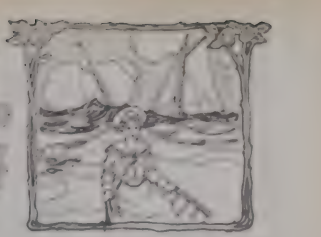
Festus, Governor of Judea: I came to Judea as the suc cessor of Felix. Being forewarned that the Jews were troublesome element, I went at once, within three days, t Jerusalem to gain favor among them. The high priest an the chief men of the Jews were ready with their complaint against one Paul, whom Felix had left in bonds. They de sired that I should return him to Jerusalem to be tried b Jewish law. I saw the manifest injustice of a man bein tried by his enemies, and so refused their request. I remaine ten days in Jerusalem and then returned to Cesarea; the da following, they came and laid many grievous complaint against Paul, which they could not prove. When I asked m prisoner if he was willing to be tried in Jerusalem, as th Jews demanded, he astonished us all by saying, "I appea unto Cesar." His case was thus taken out of my hands and I had but to wait a convenient season for sending hin to Rome. I was perplexed, because I could see no way t make a charge against him, for he had offended only agains trivial church rules of the Jews.

About that time, King Agrippa came to pay a cour visit, and I consulted him as to how a charge shoul be made to forward to Cesar. He desired to see and hear Paul. I hac the prisoner brought in chains be fore him, and made it the occasio of an assemblage of the most learned persons in my province. The sin cerity and the eloquence of the man impressed all who heard him, and Agrippa could but say, "He might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Cæsar." The day came, however, when I despatched him with other prisoners under charge of the centurion Julius. They sailed for Rome in a ship of Adramyttium.

Julius, the Chief Captain: Paul was unlike any prisoner ever before placed with me. I could but treat him with courtesy and confidence, even allowing him liberty to go and see his friends while the ship rested at Sidon. At Myra I transferred my prisoners to a larger ship that was sailing directly to Italy. Almost from the first, the winds were contrary, compelling us to take unusual courses. After great labor, we entered the roadstead of Fair Havens. I recognized my prisoner. Paul, to be a man of judgment when he urged that the vessel should be wintered there. But his suggestion was not accepted by the ship's captain, and one day, when it seemed favorable weather, we sailed away. We were very soon caught by that tempestuous wind, Euroclydon, and beaten about by it for days and days. So heavy were the clouds and the rain, that for fourteen days and nights we saw neither sun nor stars. In those trying times I discovered the mettle of Paul. By virtue of what was in him he became the chief director and consoler on the ship. But for him, I believe, all on board must have perished. They were too frightened to eat, and would have died from starvation if he had not cheered them by the assurance that no one on the ship would be drowned, even though the ship should go to pieces. He claimed to know this by a revelation from his God. When the ship did go to pieces, he with all the others came safely to land on the island of Malta. Everything which occurred showed Paul to be a remarkable man. We had hardly more than reached the island when a viper attached itself to his hand, coming out of the fire where he was warming himself. Its bite would have killed any other man, but not so Paul. He shook it off and was unharmed. During the three months we remained on that island, waiting for another ship, he showed his power by healing the sick and preaching the Gospel. It even became humiliating to me to hold such a man as a prisoner. But it was my duty to deliver him to Cæsar, and this I finally did. I afterwards heard how he was permitted to live as a prisoner in his own house for two years under the guard of a soldier, till his case was called.

Timothy, Paul's son in the faith. How he made the Bible live for me, when he first came to Derbe to preach the Gospel! I was then but a youth, and I had been well instructed in the letter of the law by my mother and my grandmother. But it had not been illuminated for me by Christian teaching. When the great apostle left Derbe, he drew me on by cords of love, and he even made me useful in a way, until after some years he appointed me to be one of his fellow helpers, and placed me in charge of the church at Corinth. The chief treasure which I have is the last letter which he ever wrote, very shortly before he was taken out to be beheaded. I could not but be a better minister all my life for the instructions that are given me in that second letter, in which he enjoins me to do the work of an evangelist and make full proof of my ministry. Soon after writing it he was beheaded; but he counted it a coronation, since death took him swiftly to his heavenly crown.

Our Household Circle



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

GOOD MANAGEMENT IN SUMMER

TO minimize discomfort and save steps should be the effort of every housekeeper during the summer days. When a woman has her house full of summer boarders, as will be the fate of some of our readers, she will smile at this advice, for her daily duties will be of the kind that pile up mountains high, and tax her strength to the uttermost. Even the summer hostess, by careful planning and good management, and by hiring a little more help than she usually does, can give herself an easier season this year than last, and the woman who has only her own family on her hands need not wear herself out if she will let her brain pilot her feet and her hands.

First, do the hardest work early in the day. Use less hot meat than in colder weather. On Saturday, for instance, prepare not only cake and pies, but Sunday's roast meat, so that the Sunday dinner may be put on the table without much extra toil. Cold meat, salad, fruit, with hot tea or coffee and good bread and butter, furnish any table well enough for all concerned in a sizzling summer day. By all means put an arrest on hard work on the Lord's day, for yourself, your children, and your servants, if you have any. And, as Monday and Wednesday and Friday are, while secular in their uses, God's own days and his free gifts to you, too, please save what strength you can in their circuit for enjoyment. It is terrible to think how many people will never secure any rest at all till their toiling hands are folded in the grave's silence and peace. Where one burns wood, the fire may be suffered to go out when not required for cooking or washing purposes, and the kitchen will then cool off, as will the flushed face of the mistress. People whose ranges burn only coal, should, if possible, procure a gas stove for summer. The saving in comfort is immense, and the cost very little beyond that involved in burning coal.

Two theories obtain in women's minds, as to the most effective method of keeping a house cool in very hot weather. Henny airs her house in the morning and hermetically seals it the rest of the day, closing every window, darkening every room, shutting every door. Where walls are thick this course is satisfactory, and the step from outdoor broiling to refrigerant chilling, is marked and agreeable; also at times it has a certain risk. There are parlors known to some of us that are vault-like in June and July; but they are not in houses built with thin partitions, and rushed from foundation to roof with the celerity during the building process of Jonah's gourd. We find such rooms in Maryland and Virginia, in Massachusetts and Maine, in homes that were erected when men took their time, and building materials were chosen with a view to durability.

Screen the ordinary every-day house in city or country, in every window and every door, from invading insect pests. Take up the cumbrous carpets and have bare floors, or use matting. Put away all the useless bric-a-brac, every vase, every curio, every dust-collecting ornament, and each thing the sun will fade, and then let the air sweep through. The house will be purer for the light, the sweeter for the wind, and the temperature will be the cooler. In extremely torrid weather, cool a room by hanging wet sheets in it or by electric fans at play.

Think nothing at all about the accidents of the thermometer. Go right on doing your work, in utter indifference to the climate, and you will be surprised to discover how slight your inconvenience will be.

Dress lightly. If obliged to go out in the middle of the day, take the shady side of the street or carry an umbrella.

Commencement Days

Our schools and colleges are getting ready for their summer examinations, and presently, with their well-earned diplomas as tokens of their diligence, a crowd of young people will take the road intent on their future careers. The professional schools will turn out lawyers and doctors and theologues, and in these youthful aspirants, now callow, now inexperienced, are concealed the eminent jurists, the skilled surgeons, and the splendid preachers of a coming day. God bless them, the boys and the girls too, who have the unknown to-morrows of life to face, and who step forth so confidently from the guardianship of their Alma Mater, with her voice crying God-speed.

A Wonderful Escape

A little German laddie, aged three, the other day leaned too far out the window of an elevated train, and fell. As he came flying through the air, death seemed inevitable, for New York paving stones are hard and Third avenue elevated trains are high. But God had given his angels charge of little Louis Leblinger, and Daniel Walsh, a man at work on the street, saw him coming, and caught him "on the fly." The child was unhurt, and the man who so opportunely caught the little fellow earned the mother's deep gratitude. In this case the mother was not to blame, the little Louis having gone with a rush before her into the train, and losing his balance as it started; but as one goes about, one often sees very great carelessness on the part of mothers, who do not realize the risks their babies take on the cars, when they let them lean out of perilously high windows.

COMING HOME

A cabin in the forest, but love and joy are there;
And sound of children's voices sweet, and parents' tender care.

Fun as a Healer

Fun has its place in home economy. When every one is good-humored, and a ripple of laughter breaks out in the kitchen, or echoes merrily through the house, you need not fear that very much is wrong. Fun is wholesome. It shuns malice and envy, and all uncharitableness. Fun has no sharp weapon to stab or dull one to wound a brother's head. When people are full of fun, they are full of kindliness, full of gentleness, full of unselfish love. The villain who steals your purse; the assassin who thrusts at you in the dark; the ruffian who attacks you on the highway, has no fun about him, he forsooth is in horrible and deadly earnest.

If you are disposed to be blue, if you are not quite well, if anything is a wee bit wrong, try what fun will do to ease the load and send you forward safely.

True Living

THEY stood silently gazing at each other as if realizing the unexpectedness of it—she a beautiful city girl and he a barefoot mountain lad, who had never been five miles beyond the precinct of his home. She had wandered from the hotel, to a sort of natural covering a short distance beyond, it had seemed that she must be miles from anything of any sort, when suddenly this smart boy confronted her. The little fellow was eagerly questioned at first, he stood gazing at her as something hitherto unknown in his meagre life, then quickly turned, and the next instant was out of the thicket about him.

She had thought when she came to the Appalachicks for her summer outing, there would not be any work here for her to do. When she had said good-bye to the little class at home in the mission school, she had not thought of going out to find others more neglected and destitute than they.

Slowly she retraced her steps, the shadow of a great burden resting on her. "How shall they learn unless they are taught," she mused. "Oh, I must make further inquiry, I can still see gazing at me those appealing, hungry eyes."

She found out the boy's history without the least trouble; the manager of the hotel had long known "him and his kind," as he called them. "You see, Miss Atkins," he said, "the boy was born there, and will probably live and die there; such life seems to suit his kind. But, more's the pity, there's several children, I think, five, all told."

"And does no one ever teach them what right living means?"

"No one ever interferes with them in the least, they live their own lives, and we live ours; and inasmuch as they do not molest us, we do not trouble ourselves about them. The children look barely civilized, and yet they say they are not of the bad sort."

The lad's appealing eyes seemed still looking at Miss Atkins as she turned away. "True living," she thought, "is not merely passing through the world with enough of all that is necessary to sustain life. It means growth into the image of Christ, rounding out one's character into disciplined manhood and womanhood." With her, once to resolve was to do, and later, when the ladies on the hotel veranda questioned her about her actions, and besought her not to expose herself at that hour of the day, she replied that she had a special work to do which required haste.

"She is certainly a peculiar girl," remarked one lady to another. "I have seldom met a one so pretty, and yet she seems entirely unconscious of it. What do you suppose she intends doing now?"

"I believe she is about the Master's business. Did you notice that intent expression in her eyes, a singleness of purpose, as she started out. I think if we wait a little while, we will learn it all."

She had been told a direct path to the mountain home, and started out without the least question or fear in her heart. "The Master's work will not brook delay," she said softly. She had not gone more than half the distance before she came across the two of them, and so intent had they been engaged in sport that they did not see her until she stood among them, arrayed, the eldest of them declared afterward, "like a very angel itself."

At first they were about to flee from her, but she had prevented against this emergency by bringing with her a number of pretty pictures. These she displayed at once, and evidently something about her manner reassured them, as upon second thought they all settled down again.

Then in simple words she won their hearts, by telling them the story of the Cross. They listened at first with evident inattention, but later their eyes brightened, and they pressed closer, not wishing to lose a single word. She must leave to remained an hour or more, and to their urgent request that she stay longer, she promised to come every day to the spot, when the weather permitted. "And when I do not come, you must come to me."

"Really, it is surprising," said the business manager of the hotel, at the close of the season, "but the brightest, most lad I have had in my employ for several years, is that mountain lad of old Elkins, as we always called him. Company Miss Atkins has exerted wonderful influence over the young."

The happy Christian girl returned to her home, filled with the quietness and confidence which no external circumstances can affect.

FRIENDS OF THE TENEMENT WAIFS

Kind Hearts in Many States Aid in Giving the Slum Children an Outing at Mont-Lawn

"MANY OF THESE WILL SEE THE COUNTRY FOR THE FIRST TIME IN THEIR LIVES"

SURELY, the neglected little children of the New York tenements owe a debt of gratitude to their good friends, who are now coming forward, with kind hearts and generous hands, to provide hundreds of the wee tots with a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn. Our CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are staunch friends of the children. They never forget them.

It may seem to be a very little thing to help a wee tenement boy or girl to a "treat" in the country—to take the waif away for awhile, from the heat of the alley and slum and gutter, and send it out among the flowers and grasses and the shade of the cool sweet woods, among the birds and the bees; but it is a Christian work, that brings joy and blessing both to the giver and the little beneficiary. A simple thing it may be, but there are few gifts that pay such interest. Surely it is not a little thing to have the prayers and the gratitude, a whole year long, of the wee man or maid who treasures the memory of those ten "red-letter days" as perhaps the brightest and best in an otherwise dull and dreary life.

We feel that something more than a mere acknowledgment is due to the many friends who are helping our Mont-Lawn work this year. Their gifts mean much more than the money alone; they mean encouragement and most grateful help to all who are engaged in the work. To the children themselves, who are taught to remember their kind benefactors, it is a constant pleasure to think of those golden-hearted men and women who have made the season of outing a joy and delight such as they never knew before. Very many of those who go to Mont-Lawn this summer will see the country for the first time in their lives. To them it will be all new and strange and wonderful. They will wander about and pick the flowers and join in the frolics on the lawn, like children in a dream. And when their holiday is ended, they will go back bronzed with the sun and made stronger by the pure air and wholesome food.

Mont-Lawn is truly the children's Paradise, and every contributor to the Fresh Air Fund, is, to the little ones, like some divine messenger who opens the gates of this delightful place, so that they may enter and enjoy its delights.

Many of the letters received during the week, show such a warm interest in the work, that we cannot forbear quoting from a few:

Enclosed find $21 to give some of "God's little ones" an outing at Mont-Lawn this summer. It is sent in the name of Jesus, who loves little children so well.

Farmland, Ind. ELIZABETH B.

Enclosed you will find $21 for the support of a cot for the season. As I write this, I feel in my heart that God will bless all who are interested in this noble work. May all the little ones become Christians.

Enclosed you will find $42, to support two cots for the summer at Mont-Lawn—in our father's and mother's name—Robert K. W. and Berlina A. W.

Canon City, Colo. L. W. F.

Mrs. M. W. L., New Haven, N. Y., in sending her gift of $12, has this to say for the little waifs: "The warm days are here, and the flowers on the bushes tell that it is the time that the children are looking for the trip to the country, to give them fresh air for their feeble bodies. As I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of their anxiety to enjoy the country, I feel that I should, as I have done in other years, hand in my fund of $12, to give four little ones a pleasure that I could not do in any other way. As I have not any children of my own, I feel it belongs to me to give some of the needy ones a treat."

"I have a Sunday School class of eight little girls," writes Mrs. Daisy L., Martel, O., "and with my assistance they wished to help a little child of the New York slums, and so we send you our contribution. My little girls' hearts were touched by the sad pleadings of the sick children, which I read to them from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. May God's blessing rest on this work."

"Bless the poor little tots. I wish I could send them all to Mont-Lawn," is the hearty letter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas W., Eddyville, Neb., who forwarded $6.

I enclose $5 for the Little Waifs of Mont-Lawn, and $5 for the hungry and starving.

South Durham, Me. T. F. L

I send this $6, with the prayer it may bring health and cheer to some of the suffering little ones, in the slums of the great city.

Chicago, Ill. MISS MARY W. R., & MRS. R.

I send this $3, in the name of a darling child who died a number of years since—Georgie Edna G. MRS. ETTA M. G.

Lower Gilmanton, N.H.

Enclosed please find $3, with the hope that it may give to one expectant waif, a happy ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn, the ideal home for the suffering little ones. I wish this amount were multiplied many times.

Boonville, Mo. S. B. M.

IDOLS IN A BURMESE TEMPLE

MONG, THE BURMAN CONVERT

MONG SHAWLOO was converted at an early age and came to America to seek an education. He was a bright young fellow, and much given to wit. One day, of Bob Townsend, the college wag, Mong asked: "How do you capture birds in America?" The reply was: "We put salt on their tails." Mong made no sign. Later, Bob asked, forgetting the former incident: "What is the method of securing so large game as the elephant in your country, Mong?" "We put salt on their tails," was the reply. Then Townsend remembered.

The young Burman acquired an excellent education in this country, university, theological and medical, and was graduated from the

MONG SHAWLOO

University of Lewisburg," Pennsylvania, now "Bucknell." He provided for much of his education by lecturing, in which he excelled. Having fulfilled his mission, he returned to his native Burmah, calling at London, Paris, Marseilles and Calcutta. At the latter city, just before debarking, he was made the recipient of a purse containing one hundred and twenty dollars in English sovereigns, in token of the pleasure he had afforded the passengers on the steamer, by the delivery of one of his lectures, and as a compliment on having "brought so good an education from the United States." Four days from Calcutta, he arrived in Burmah, and debarked at Moulmein. First he sought his family, then the Burman king. The latter immediately gave orders to provide the best quarters for the returned stranger; and the king's sword-bearer escorted him to the palace, and introduced him, saying: "This is the doctor who came from America with letters from the King of the United States"—meaning the President. After this it became Mong's custom to frequently dine at the royal palace.

Mong's chosen vocation was teaching, practicing medicine and preaching the Gospel. In September, 1868, the year in which he left America, he married a young Eurasian woman—a pupil of Miss Haswell—who died early in their married life. Later, he was married to a Burmese lady, who also had been a pupil of Miss Haswell. They now occupy a beautiful home in Moulmein.

Dr. Shawloo (Mong), is now chiefly occupied with a dispensary in his own home—which is opposite the Burmese church—and in preaching the Gospel. His patients are Burmese, Chinese, Talaings, Eurasians, Karens, Jews, Mussulmans, Telugus, higher caste and lower caste, besides Japanese. In Moulmein, there are several churches—Burmese, Karen and English—and many schools, where the pupils are taught in these various tongues, Some of the church congregations are very large. It strikes one as strange to hear of "Mission street," in a city once given to idolatry—yet such is the name of one of the thoroughfares.

In a letter written to Dr. W. L. Griffin, of Lamar, Mo., dated December 12, 1902, Mong relates an interesting incident. He writes:

"A few days ago, I was called to visit a patient near the border of the Shan States—a day's journey; but he was beyond recovery. As there was no preacher to perform the funeral rites, it remained for me to perform that melancholy duty. I was engaged the whole of Sunday in talking and preaching to the people who had come to attend the funeral services. The deceased was converted only a few months ago, and he died in the faith.

"He and his wife were pure heathen, and were converted to the religion of Jesus at the age of seventy-one years. He had the comforts of the Holy Spirit, therefore, for only seven months. The wife is still living."

Rangoon, the commercial metropolis, is growing with great rapidity, in common with the other chief cities of Burmah. Two steamers ply regularly between Moulmein and Rangoon. The Burmese Government has just contracted for the construction of a railway between these two cities.

A Praying Mother's Influence

During the recent meeting held in Aberdeen, Scotland, by the Rev. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago, the Christian Endeavor Societies of Peterhead and Fraserburgh organized an excursion for the purpose of hearing him. Over two of the party attended the evening meeting. A day or two after, a minister who had accompanied them, wrote, stating that one of the young men had been led to accept Christ as his Saviour. This man—a fisherman by trade—had a Christian mother, and when he was leaving home she got her boy to promise to attend the meeting, and added that she would be praying for him. He kept his promise and came to the Music Hall. All through the service he thought he heard his mother's voice, saying, "Lord, save my boy! Lord, save my boy!" He could not get rid of the thought of his mother praying from him. His heart was softened and opened to the Word of God. That night he went home rejoicing in Christ.

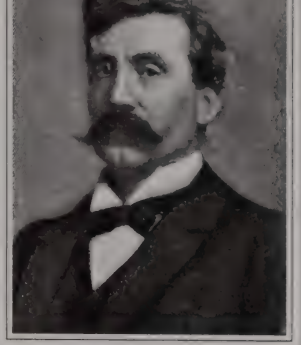
THE NEW MODERATOR

The Presbyterian General Assembly Confers the Honor on Dr. Coyle

MORE than ordinary interest was aroused in the election of a Moderator this year by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. Its choice of a recipient for the highest honor in its gift is always recognized as a test of its spirit. This year, when creed revision is its chief business, the vote was expected to be indicative of the mood in which that business would be approached. Five candidates were in the field, one of whom refused the nomination, though his friends persisted in casting their votes for him. This was Dr. A. C. Zenos, Professor of Church History in McCormick Theological Seminary. Rev. David B. Fitzgerald, of Cincinnati, nominated Dr. David S. Schaff, D.D., Professor of Church History in Lane Theological Seminary. Dr. Page offered the name of Dr. Robert F. Coyle, Pastor of Central Church, Denver. President McCormick nominated Dr. W. H. Roberts, for nineteen years past the stated clerk of the Assembly. The list of nominees was completed when Rev. Orville Reed, of Montclair, N. J., named Dr. Calvin W. Mateer, the missionary candidate, founder of Teng Chow College, China. The first ballot showed 310 votes for Dr. Coyle, 258 for Dr. W. H. Roberts, 86 for Dr. Mateer, 21 for Dr. Zenos, 14 for Dr. Schaff. The majority for Dr. Coyle was so large that his election was assured, so Dr. Roberts, who has several times narrowly escaped the lightning, gracefully retired from the contest, and the election of Dr. Coyle was made unanimous.

The significance of the election consists in the fact that the supporters of Dr. Coyle are the advocates of a revision of the creed. Time was when so far from being able to elect a Moderator, they were so small a handful that they could only with difficulty obtain a hearing; but even Presbyterian ministers are not proof against the influence of modern thought, and gradually the numbers of the liberals have grown, until in a total vote of nearly seven hundred, over three hundred supported the candidate.

Dr. Coyle is a Canadian by birth, but his education and his work were both American. He is in his fifty-fourth year. He graduated from Wabash College, Ind., in 1877, and two years later was ordained at Fort Dodge, Ia. Six years of faithful and successful work in that charge, were followed by the pastorate of Fullerton Avenue Church, in Chicago, whence he went to Oakland, Calif., and later to the Central Church of Denver, Colo., his present charge. There seems no doubt from his past record that he will have no difficulty in manifesting the three qualities of which Dr. Van Dyke told him he would be in need in his new office: Firmness, Friendliness, and Faithfulness.



REV. ROBERT F. COYLE, D.D.

It must be a great relief to the new Moderator to have the crucial question of creed revision disposed of. The explanatory statement accepted by the Assembly should set the question at rest, at least for the present. It removes the stumbling-blocks of reprobation and infant damnation which the creed appeared to teach, although its friends declared that it did not. We learn now that: "God has provided a salvation sufficient for all and freely offered to all," which is a statement sufficiently Arminian for practical purposes. As to children dying in infancy, the declaration expresses the confident belief that they are saved. This also is an important concession, which the fathers of the clergymen assembled at Los Angeles would probably have been reluctant to make.

An Uplifting Influence

If any man can read The Speaking Oak and not be filled with nobler aspirations and purer thoughts he does not know how to make use of the faculties that God has given him. WM. H. BROOKS.

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM CXLI
Humble Man's Psalm

3. Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips. 4. Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity; and let me not eat of their dainties.

5. Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head.

"LET HIM REPROVE ME"

This is a day of pride and position, with loud talk and loud life, that catch so many like a snare and hasten them to their grave—buried both in earth and oblivion. It's needful for the many who want abiding exaltation, to read what God writes about humility, and take the position of the writer of Psalm CXLI, verse 5. Mighty few folk, these days, ask for reproof, and less want the good stroke of rebuke that a real righteous man can give. If the reader can get as low-down as this, he will know in due time what it is to be truly exalted.

PSALM CXLII
Psalm for Prisoners

7. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name.

"MY SOUL OUT OF PRISON"

The jail for the body is bad, but a prison for the soul is worse. Captives in Eastern countries fare ill, but no Japanese, Chinese, Russian, or Roman prisoners suffer the wants and horrors and shame of those who are locked up in a life of sin and misery, with the jailer of conscience to goad them and with the vermin of wickedness to defile and annoy them. Listen, sinner! You are a "prisoner of hope," for Christ came to set the captive free—free not only from the guilt of sin, but free from the love of sin; free not only from the penalty of sin, but from the power of it; and above that is added freedom from fear—even of death; for he led captivity captive. Hallelujah!

PSALM CXLIII
Psalm for the Faint-hearted

1. Hear my prayer, O Lord, give ear to my supplications; in thy faithfulness answer me, and in thy righteousness.

2. And enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified.

3. For the enemy hath persecuted my soul; he hath smitten my life down to the ground; he hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead.

4. Therefore is my spirit overwhelmed within me; my heart within me is desolate.

"HE HATH SMITTEN MY LIFE"

Faint-hearted folk are not few. They ought to be living under the powerful promises of God and the powerful providences that he provides. It's not wise to starve in the midst of plenty, nor die of thirst by a spring of water. This is a queer world, and the people are like the place they live in. Might as well "grease a fat goose," as to ask for more protection and promises from above. All that heaven has is at the disposal of folk with overwhelmed spirits. How quickly would misery change into mercy, if the magic power of faith be applied.

PSALM CXLIV
Soldier's Psalm

1. Blessed be the Lord my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight.

2. My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth my people under me.

"TEACHETH MY HANDS TO WAR"

God is on the side of right, and his battalions are the heaviest, though often unseen. To die for freedom, honor and flag is noble; but the noblest of all was when the Captain of the Lord's hosts laid down his life for his enemies. Soldiers who fight Satan, sin and selfishness, wage a heavy war, and need the truth of verse one in this Psalm. The closing verse is the acclamation of praise to the Leader, who taught their "hands to war," and their "fingers to fight."

PSALM CXLV
Psalm of Greatness

3. Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable. 4. One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts.

5. I will speak of the glorious honor of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works.

6. And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts; and I will declare thy greatness.

"OF THY WONDROUS WORKS"

Little folk—and there be many—use language lightly and call small things great. It is not every one who can tell the difference between Shakespeare and Job, nor between Huxley and John, or Spencer and Isaiah. There are legislators who think their enactments are greater than the Ten Commandments, and their laws more beneficial than the Sermon on the Mount. Men who spend much time before a looking-glass—women too—see but little. It's poor policy for even a Christian to be looking at himself; better look to God.

PSALM CXLVI
Preservation Psalm

5. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God.

6. Which made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is, which keepeth truth forever.

7. Which executeth judgment for the oppressed; which giveth food to the hungry. The Lord looseth the prisoners.

8. The Lord openeth the eyes of the blind; the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down; the Lord loveth the righteous.

9. The Lord preserveth the strangers; he relieveth the fatherless and widow.

"HE RELIEVETH THE FATHERLESS"

It is one thing to be made good, but quite another thing to be kept so. It is one thing to be converted, another thing to grow up and be a strong Christian and possess genuine worth and be a pillar in the church of our God. The black smallpox of sin is epidemic these days. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure;" far better ask God to save you from going into wickedness, than to deliver you after your feet are fast in the mire. The shout of victory in a moral battle must be music, both here and in heaven.

"Superb Treasures"

The Speaking Oak and The Hall of Fame are superb treasures, but language fails when I come to speak of the Red Letter Bible. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has become a part of my household. I have taken it for over fifteen years. When, for any cause, the mail-carrier fails to bring it at the proper time, there is a vacancy no other paper can fill. Every page is so bright and cheery; the illustrations are all so attractive; the Sunday School lesson is beautifully elucidated; the sermon is so profound and elevating, that when the paper has been read from start to finish, one feels like taking it and hiding away in secret to read it over and over again, as the college student who gets the first letter from his distant home. So dear has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD become that I want every one to have a copy, and as actions speak louder than words, I have chosen it as the best gift I could offer my Sunday School class, having given eight copies in that way. C. N. ROBINSON.

MEDICAL MISSIONS*

Humanity and Christianity Alike Demand the Services of the Consecrated Physician

OF all distressing stories, there are none we have heard or read, so heartrending as that of the treatment of physical trouble in heathen lands. It is simply appalling to hear of the miseries inflicted on women in the hour of their maternity, on sick persons in their weakness and pain, and on the crippled and deformed. Even when no actual ill-treatment has to be endured the remedies applied are ridiculous. Miss Rachel Benn, who has labored as a medical missionary in China, tells us that when she was called in by a Chinese gentleman in a crisis, she found that the Chinese doctor had exhausted his resources when he had burned incense and had placed in the patient's hair slips of red paper on which mystic characters were written. In Africa, the witch doctor is a much more dangerous attendant. His theory is that the illness he is called on to cure, is the work of a wizard or a witch, and when he has indicated the perpetrator of the evil, vengeance follows without bringing relief to the sufferer.

Humanity alone calls for the medical missionary; but when we realize how numerous are the opportunities that a godly physician has of preaching the Gospel, religion joins in the appeal. Doors open to the skilful physician, which are closed against the preacher. Dr. F. P. Lynch tells of a district in Africa, in which the people firmly and resolutely refused to receive a missionary. There was a woman too ill to walk, who was carried through that district a three days' journey, to be treated by the medical missionary. She did not belong to the district, but her condition was seen. In a few weeks she walked back, well and strong. The people were not long in drawing a conclusion. They said, "We have misunderstood those white men;" and a cordial invitation to preach was given.

Most valuable is the work of the woman medical missionary. The Mohammedan, the Hindoo, and often the Chinaman, would rather prefer that his wife should die, than that she should be treated by a man. The woman doctor, however, is welcome, and none can ever recount the lives she has saved and the pain she has alleviated, and the souls she has led to Christ. Any League wishing to do effective missionary work, can spend its money in no better way, than by qualifying some consecrated Christian woman to become a medical missionary in a heathen land. This journal knows of one case in which only twenty dollars a month, for two years, would enable one such woman to finish her studies, and would give to India a devoted physician, whose work in the service of Christ would be of inestimable value.

PAUL AND HIS MASTER

Striking Parallels in the Lives of Christ and the Apostle

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IN the early part of our Christian life, God's education of his children is, in great measure, directed to making us more useful as his instruments in the salvation of other men; in the latter part of our Christian life, while he may still use us in his service, his lessons are more directed to the preparation of his beloved ones for himself, by proving them in many and divers tests, and by teaching us to understand him in his purposes. And to this end his lessons are more and more humbling—there is less and less for the flesh to glory in. God's ripening servants are more noticeable for what they are than for what they do. The man who everywhere had caused such a stir that the jealousy of the unbelieving Jews was everywhere aroused against him, and they gave him credit for turning the world upside down—when he spoke on the stairs of the castle at Jerusalem—seemed to have left no converted hearers behind him.

"It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master," might be the motto of the latter part of Paul's life. Once only our blessed Lord Jesus had a difficulty to know the will of the Father; it was in Gethsemane. Paul also in his last journey to Jerusalem was, as we have seen, in perplexity about the will of God. He had a conviction that he should go to Jerusalem, and yet the saints in every place said by the Spirit that he should not go there. Our Lord knew that his last journey to Jerusalem was for shame and suffering: "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all the things that are written by the prophets shall be accomplished unto the Son of Man, for he shall be delivered up unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and shamefully entreated, and spit upon, and they shall scourge and kill him; and the third day he shall rise again" (Luke 18:31-33, R. V.). Paul said: "And now behold I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost testifieth unto me in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me" (Acts 20:22, 23, R. V.). We cannot but mark the similarity.

Again, there is a parallel in Paul's arrest, for no sin of his, but only the hatred of those who would not hear the truth. The plot against Paul—how like the plottings of the chief priests and scribes against his Master! Our Lord was brought before the priestly tribunal, King Herod and the Roman Governor, Pontius Pilate. Paul also stood before the high priest, King Herod, Agrippa, and before the Roman Governors Festus and Felix, and finally before Nero. But far more than his outward circumstances was the similarity of his spirit with that of his Master. Paul saw God in all that happened to him, and none of these things moved him, just as our Lord steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem, and drank willingly the cup which his Father gave him. Paul had good reason to say, more than once, "be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ."

Again in his writings, we see the same spirit. While our Lord was continually subject to the insults and the hatred of the Pharisees, his life and his teaching breathed out love, and that wonderful chapter, I. Cor. 13, was written by the man who was hunted out of almost every place where he preached, by the same class—the Jewish Pharisees. He had the sentence of death in himself, that he should not trust in himself, but in God that raiseth the dead, (II. Cor. 1:9), and his great and constant theme was, "Christ and the resurrection"; Christ as a life-giving Spirit. Our Lord not only taught men what they should be, but came to die for them that he might make it possible, by imparting to them the very life which produces such virtues. Paul had no life-giving power like the Lord Jesus, but he ministered the Spirit (II. Cor. 3:6; Gal. 3:5), as an instrument of Him who is Himself "the Fountain of life."

We see in this man what a Spirit-filled man can be, and what God means that a man filled with the Holy Ghost should be. In the shipwreck, the prisoner becomes virtually the captain of the ship, and it might be said of him, as it was of his Master: "He saved others; himself he cannot save."

Another "Rough Rider" Wins Out

WILLIE FUGATE is a twelve year-old boy living in a town of 200 inhabitants in the Pecos River Valley, New Mexico on the line of the Santa Fe Railroad. He had a bronco, but had grown tired of riding "bareback" and wanted a saddle. He read of a boy in an Eastern town having made money by selling The Saturday Evening Post, and wrote for information. His neighbors did not know much about THE POST and he sold only two copies out of the ten received. ¶ Most of the trains stop at Willie's town for water and he wandered down to the station "to see the train come in." When he saw a number of passengers step out of the train a thought struck him. Mounting a pile of ties, he announced in a loud voice: "You won't have a chance to get any more reading matter for 250 miles—you'd better get a copy of this week's SATURDAY EVENING POST." In about two minutes he had sold the other eight copies and could have sold a dozen more. That night he wrote for 50 copies for next week and sold every one.

During the next month he sold over 400 copies and bought "not only a dandy saddle but a blanket." Since then he has sold an average of about 125 copies a week and each month won one of the cash prizes offered to the boys who do good work. He writes: "We have more copies than people here, but I think I can jump that order to 200 copies a week when the travel gets a little heavier."

Through the Wild Kentucky Hills

Wednesday was the day of the annual meeting, when the directors gathered in Grant-Lee Hall. There were present eight of the members, and eight were represented by proxy. For the whole day, this board, which receives no compensation, which indeed is wholly benevolent, bent all their energies to the work of the university. There never was a more cheerful scene than that at their long table at every meal.

The concert given by the musical department, under the leadership of Miss Larry, came very near being destroyed by the sickness of two members of the orchestra, and by a storm of wind, rain, and lightning, which came suddenly over the mountains, just at the time the performance was to begin at the new dormitory; but we all waded through the mud and wet paths the twelve hundred yards to the new building. Those who knew music were given a treat indeed. The commencement orations, the essays, the poems (in English and in German), and finally the public discussion by three young students of a subject which I gave them off-hand, could not be excelled. Col. H. H. Adams, one of our directors, gave two prizes, one fifteen dollars, the other ten, for the best extemporaneous address of ten minutes. Three young men participated; the subject being "The blessing of good roads in the mountains." Gillis Cox won the first prize, and H. G. Beeler the second, and all three seemed to me to be worthy of a prize, for none of them had the slightest intimation of the subject.

We elected two new Board members; Hon. Stewart L. Woodford, of New York, and Fred C. Chamberlin, Esq., of Boston. The latter made the address, in which he gave as a motto to the schools, the last words of Col. Guy Howard, as he fell in defence of his country in the Phillipines: "Whatever happens to me, keep the launch going." The different members of the Board also made feeling addresses, and the Rev. Mr. Stewart, of the Baptist Church, paid a short tribute to General Howard, in behalf of the mountain youth.

I wish I could tell you of something of the beauty, and I may say the glory, of this occasion. One visit of a large party on horseback to the top of the highest mountain west of the village of Cumberland Gap, called "The Pinnacle," was especially representative. We dismounted, and gathered plants and flowers for mementoes. Members of the University took hold of hands, and feelingly uttered loyal sentiments—loyal to the hope and the promise of the great institution, whose grounds were then within the scope of their vision. These broad expanses, far away in Virginia to the east, in Tennessee to the north, and in Kentucky to the west, all in sight, enlarge one's thoughts, one's hopes, and indeed one's purposes, for the benefit of the inhabitants of such vast regions. A single thought has been present in the minds of all other visitors, as well as of Mr. Chamberlin and myself, namely: how singularly absurd it is to call the youth of this region, for hundreds of miles around, "poor whites." They do not deserve this name any more than any of the members of our Board of Directors, or more than the students of Bowdoin, or Dartmouth. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD.

National Baptist Anniversaries

BY WARREN G. PARTRIDGE

THE National Baptist Anniversaries recently held in Buffalo were the largest in several years. It was estimated that there were over 1,500 delegates and visitors. The meetings were held in the Prospect Avenue Baptist Church, and in the Delaware Avenue Baptist Church. The crowds were so large that it was necessary to hold some overflow meetings in the evening. There were many missionaries present, and several meetings were held specially for them to meet each other, and to make addresses. There was also a meeting of the young people on Sunday afternoon, and addresses were made to arouse the young people in more aggressive work and to attend the National Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union, which will be held in Atlanta, Ga., in July.

The report of the Women's Home Mission Society of the West, showed that the society has had a very successful year. It has paid all bills, and has no deficit. The members were addressed by several home missionaries, and there were reports from Cuba, Mexico, Porto Rico; from the West, from the Indians, and from the work among the Mormons. One lady missionary said that polygamy is still prevalent in Utah, and that the Mormons are laying their plans to bring back polygamy, with all its terrible evils, into Utah. She said that the Mormons believe that there is but one true government in the world, and that is the Mormon Theocracy, and that the Mormon leaders are plotting to take political Mormonism into every State in the Union. A resolution was passed calling upon the Senate of the United States to expel Apostle Smoot from that body.

One of the most important sessions of the Baptist Anniversaries was that called to discuss the co ordination or consolidation of the three great missionary societies. It is no secret that there has been friction between these societies, and a proposal was made some years ago to get rid of the friction by combining all three societies into one. The scheme was radical, and even its advocates admitted that it had its difficulties, inasmuch as it committed to one body work of different kinds. Naturally there were many opponents of the scheme, especially in the various boards. Finally a committee of fifteen was appointed last year to investigate the matter, and this year that committee was to present its recommendations. The question has been discussed for about three years, and there have been some lively debates carried on in the denominational papers. A very animated discussion was expected in the mass meeting, and the house was packed by an expectant audience. President Faunce, of Brown University was chairman of the committee and read the report. It was statesmanlike, wise and comprehensive. The report was so able, so discriminating, and so impartial, that it was received with cheers. There was a short discussion, and this was all favorable to the report, and it was adopted unanimously. Those who were expected to oppose the report did not speak, and there was such a spirit of brotherly love and unanimity, that the great audience rose and sang with enthusism, "The Doxology." This was a red-letter day in Baptist history, and many claim that it is the most momentous step taken by the Baptists in a generation.

One provision of this report, which was adopted, will have far-reaching influence. It is the creation of a Tribunal of Arbitration. It is called the Conference Committee, and will consist of nine persons, who shall be elected every year. This Arbitration Tribunal will hear all complaints of the different societies and of the different workers in the societies, and then give a final decision upon the merits of each case. There has been the most friction between the American Publication Society and the American Baptist Home Mission Society. The former society has many chapel cars, and these cars often organize Sunday Schools and churches in the far West. This work often interferes with the work of the Home Mission Society, which may not have enough funds to furnish the new churches. Mistakes are sometimes made in the organizing and location of new churches. These two societies often seem to have their work overlap. This Conference Committee of nine persons will decide the questions at issue, and will thus save much friction and waste.

Another important meeting was that of the Home Mission Society. The meeting was deeply moved by an address by Dr. A. C. Dixon, on the "New Evangelism," and a motion was made and unanimously adopted to give practical effect to his suggestions. It calls upon the executive officers of the Home Mission Society to inaugurate a forward movement in America, under the impulse of the New Evangelism. It was also proposed that an effort be made to raise, at once, $25,000 to carry forward this evangelistic campaign. It was suggested that this work at once be pushed in every Association, in every State and Territory in the Union.

PIONEER LIFE IN NEBRASKA

By Moses H. Sydenham, the First Editor and Oldest Inhabitant of Central and Western Nebraska

I WAS born in the Jewish quarter of the city of London, Eng., between Whitechapel and the great Synagogue. My father was of the Naaman family of the tribe of Benjamin, and my mother of the tribe of Judah, but she trained me in the Christian faith of the Church of England.

I left London in 1854, for the United States, where, after considerable traveling on the ocean and on the land, watched over and directed by divine providence, I finally, in the winter of 1856-57, located at Fort Kearney, a United States military station in the midst of the Great American Desert—midway between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains—then inhabited only by the Pawnee nation of Indians. At this fort, I was for about fifteen years Indian trader, fort trader, and postmaster; and did Christian missionary work with the soldiers, with the Indians and with the early settlers.

My chief mission here in the desert seemed to be to find out, and make known to the millions of people of the far East the latent possibilities of the great central region of desert plains of the American Republic, as homes for the homeless of God's people, Israel, in the United States and British lands. I experimented with, and tested the soil from year to year; noted the rainfall, and other atmospheric phenomena; and after twelve years of experience gave the results of my investigations in a prepared lecture on "The Physical Development of Nebraska," which included all the great Desert within the boundaries of Kansas, Colorado, and South Dakota as well.

This lecture, delivered at Omaha, gave a description of the lands and the watercourses, and foretold how the whole Great American Desert of past ages described in the school geographies, might be made a garden spot by means of irrigation from its rivers, — the Platte especially furnishing water for thousands of canals. And, as an attract intelligent, progressive people to this unpeopled country, I advocated the Fort Kearney ten mile square Military Reservation on the Platte Valley, for a new National Capital, to be known as New Washington.

In 1869, one of our merchants at Fort Kearney City planted a field of corn in the Kearney sand hills, on ground never before ploughed; planted it at a venture very late, the 20th day of June. When this corn was harvested, I saw it was of large size and excellent quality. I secured some, and sent down some sample ears to the editors of the papers at the Missouri River cities, where were the only settlements then to speak of, with a statement as to date of planting, etc. That was another great advertisement of the land.

Then the Burlington & Missouri Railroad Company became interested, and rushed their railroad from Iowa into Nebraska—to meet the coming demands for transportation facilities.

The people have come, and a cosmopolitan population of the ten tribes of Israel, as well as that of Judah, Levi and Benjamin, are scattered over the once "Great American Desert," in prosperous business, on the farms or in the cities, in this part of God's promised land.

I published my Kearney Herald at Fort Kearney, in 1862, to herald the coming of Christian civilization in the desert wilderness. My Central Star was published in 1870, to advocate the removal of the U. S. Capital to Nebraska, and advertise the country. In 1890 I published my Central Star of Empire.

My whole life has been a very eventful one. On the ocean, as a sailor before the mast, among the Sioux, Cheyennes and Pawnees, and among the wild white men and cowboys, who come with all others to a new country, I have had many narrow escapes from death, but have been saved from all when near to danger by a special divine providence through celestial influences, sometimes made known to myself, as well as to others, by dreams. I can recall a dozen instances, at least, where I have been specially saved.

MOSES H. SYDENHAM.

ESKAY'S FOOD BABIES

Are always Well and Happy

HELEN Q. CHALFANT, daughter of W. W. Chalfant, a prominent Philadelphia druggist, who is proud of this Eskay's Food baby.

What an Eskay's Food boy looks like at 5 years of age.

KARL VOGT, son of George C. Vogt, Rochester, N. Y., saved from Cholera Infantum through the use of Eskay's Food.

BOTH PICTURES AND LETTERS SPEAK FOR US

A Philadelphia physician (whose name we omit for ethical reasons) gives us the following report of his experience with Eskay's:

"I have been prescribing your Eskay's Albuminized Food some time and find it a most excellent thing where artificial feeding is required. In the summer diarrhœa of children associated with vomiting, it not only quickly changes the character of the passages, but seems also to have the happy effect of allaying the vomiting."

Mrs. C. M. Sears, 617 Second St., Elmira, N. Y., writes April 19th, 1903: "I can safely say that Eskay's Food saved my baby's life. He had bowel trouble all last summer and in the month of August he grew worse and we thought he could not live. We tried everything in the shape of milk, and at last we gave him Eskay's Food prepared with water only, and he began to mend right away. When he was strong enough we added a little milk, and gradually increased it until we had the proper amount. When we began using it he was 15 months old and weighed 16 lbs. Now he is 22 months old and weighs 32 lbs. I have recommended your food to a great many people."

S. L. Gartside, 1918 W. Lafayette Ave., Baltimore, Md., writes in August 30th, 1902. "Our baby is in perfect health. She has never tasted anything but Eskay's Food. She has cut two teeth this summer, and she did it so nicely that we were not aware of it until we felt her gums and made the discovery. The baby is now nine months old (Aug. 25th) and weighs 20½ lbs. At six month of age she weighed 17 lbs. while at birth she weighed only 5½ lbs. Everyone who sees her pronounces her a very fine baby, and she is as bright as she can possibly be. She sleeps very well."

Eskay's Food, because it is assimilated as easily as healthy mother's milk and because of its health-giving, health-bringing qualities, has a healing, strengthening effect upon delicate stomachs and systems. It has brought thousands of babies from the very brink of the grave to rosy health. Doctors everywhere prescribe it. Our helpful book for mothers and all who have the care of children, "HOW TO CARE FOR THE BABY"—free on request—with generous trial sample of ESKAY'S FOOD.

Guam Has a Hundred Earthquake Shocks

Ninety-eight Buildings on our Little Island Possession Demolished by the Severest Visitation Ever Known There

ON Monday morning, Sept. 22, 1902, at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock, the 10,000 people of our little island possession of Guam, were thrown into consternation by one of the severest earthquakes that has ever been known here. The undulatory motions were first from north to south, followed by others which seemed to be from east to west, with a slight remittent between them; the whole continuing about four minutes. Our missionary houses are practically on a solid rock, so that we did not see the undulatory wave; but they were especially noticed in Agana, by various persons. The plaza—a plot of ground of about five acres, in front of the Government house—was observed to heave and fall like a sea with a swell. The chimney of the ice-plant engine is one hundred feet high; its top is said to have described an arc twenty feet long.

We were sitting in our house when the shaking began, but as we were used to slight earth-tremors, we were not alarmed. As they became more violent, we were driven from the house, and, as we passed outside, we saw the elevated tanks tumbling down, and heard the crash of falling furniture. As soon as the shocks ceased, we returned to the house, where we found the bookcase overturned; a chair smashed; vases thrown down from the shelves, and things piled about in confusion, generally. We were thankful, however, that our houses were not racked.

In Agana, the scene was terrible. The tiles of the stone house shook off like ripe nuts from trees. There was a rain of tiles, broken pieces of mortar, and various timbers of the houses. The so-called stone walls, which are composed very largely of mortar and sand, and built around a skeleton wooden frame, cracked, crumbled, and fell, leaving the grim skeleton standing alone. The terrified people ran from their houses, crying out in the only prayer they knew: "Jesus! Maria! Jose! Jesus! Maria! Jose!" and this cry rent the air from all parts of the town. Even the streets did not seem safe, for in some places the ground cracked open, or caved in, leaving wide fissures or great holes like wells.

In summing up the results we find that ninety-eight buildings were more or less completely wrecked—some only slightly injured, some totally destroyed.

The loss falls heavily on the rich and well-to-do; the poor people, in their little shacks, were comparatively untouched.

The surface of the island is not very materially changed. In some places there were heavy landslides, and only a short distance from our house, a huge boulder, presenting, as some thought, an Indian face, was loosed from its bed, and came careering down the mountain side, finding a convenient landing-place in the centre of the road. The bluff overhanging Agana, fortunately, did not crumble.

April 12, 1903. The earthquake has left its mark distinctly on the island people. Since the great shaker, there have been otherpetated shocks, and many people are timid. There have probably been not less than one hundred distinct shocks and very many slight tremors. The people have regained their houses, and many of the Americans have lost their fears and returned to the little stone houses.

Still, all who remember the terrible warning of Sept. 22, 1902, cannot but reflect on the uncertainty of earthly things, and even at "morbid [illegible]" hereafter, and some we hope, may have been moved to think of the Eternal City, whose makers and builder is God.

A FAMILY GROUP OF NATIVES OF GUAM

DWELLING RUINED BY THE SHOCKS

CATHOLIC CHURCH RENT BY EARTHQUAKE

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has a work in the island of Guam for the people of [illegible] years, the writer, with his wife and Miss Mary Chamberlain being the first missionaries. The work met with the usual experiences of Protestant work in Catholic communities, but it has gone on quietly, gaining opposition and natural prejudices, until the present time, when it has a small property in Agana, good Mission buildings at a point near the town, a community of about one hundred adherents, a day school, a boarding school, and a promising evangelistic work. Thousands have been sent, but a large number of these have been purchased, and there are a great many who know and confess the pentecostal power of God's Holy Spirit. But there are [illegible] thousands away from their people at present, and many a public profession of their adherence to their belief. The people themselves are well disposed towards the missionaries.

The people of Agana, the capital, are very different from those of the Carolina Islands group. They are more intelligent and progressive. Their language is more highly inflected, having prefixes and suffixes for the pronouns of the verbs and singular and plural forms. The vocabulary is fuller, having numerous words from many languages, principally the Spanish. They are a very peaceable people as a rule, quarreling little among themselves, and given to deeds of violence and crushing for the most part, in families. They like to be in crowds, and most farmers live in the town, going as far as twelve miles to cultivate their farms. The men spend the week in their ranches coming home late on Saturday night, spending Sunday with their wives and children, and leaving very early on Monday. The women and some of the men go to early Sunday morning mass; the rest of the Sabbath day is given to sports of various kinds, trading and dining with [illegible]. Gambling is a great vice among them, and on Sundays and holidays the streets of Agana swarm with crowds of men and boys gambling cocks for money. They [illegible] as we [illegible] quarrel, but we [illegible] taking the Lord's name in vain. The [illegible] is often profaned on the [illegible].

In some towns, as far as I know, there is a divine [illegible] [illegible] Christ and [illegible] and [illegible] of souls. By and by, the people [illegible] [illegible] and practical [illegible] [illegible] I hope some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] will [illegible].

Summer Red-Lights

Text—Numbers 32 : 23 :

"Be sure your sin will find you out"

WHAT are you going to do this summer? "Take a vacation," you answer. "I am going away to the country. There was once a time when I did not believe in summer vacations. I thought they were merely lazy men's excuses for shirking work. But now I know that I was mistaken. I have been gradually breaking down under the ceaseless monotonies of business. I want and need a change. I am going out among the green hills, or down by the sea-shore. I will leave word that all letters and telegrams at the store, as far as possible, must remain unanswered until I get back. I am going to rusticate. I shall turn myself out to grass, and let my mind run fallow."

Good resolve, that. I always did believe it better to pay for a fresh-air tonic and country sunlight, than for a medicine chest. I always did believe it far better to associate with the farmer, the fisherman, and the country toll-gate keeper, for a little while during the summer, than it is to have the doctor, and the trained nurse your constant visitants during the winter. The hammerings of the wood-pecker are much more pleasant for one to hear than the creakings of rheumatic joints. The sunrise over the eastern hills in the country, after one has gone to bed at nine o'clock, and slept through the night, is a far more enjoyable sight to see than a sunrise in the city, which one witnesses after an agonizing night of sleeplessness, caused by that worst of all inquisitorial fiends, called insomnia.

A Time of Temptation

But, my hearers, before we separate for the summer, as your pastor, I would like to ask you another question. What do you expect to do when you are in the country? How are you going to spend that vacation? "Well," you answer, "I really do not know. I am going to let things drift and not make any plans. If I feel like fishing, I will fish. If I want to take a drive, I will go driving, or I will take a trip upon my bicycle. But the simple fact is I am not an enthusiastic sportsman. I fear the time, some days, may drag heavily. But go away to the country I will. I know I need the trip." Yes, my brother, your answer is that which most men can give. You have been working hard during your life. In one sense you have destroyed your ability to play. Therefore, when you go to the country, and do not know what to do, temptations will there assail you which would never tempt you when you are at home, and at work. Now, the purpose of this sermon is not to talk to libertines and loafers, and dead-beats. It is not to upbraid the social outcasts and the sinful vampires who as human leeches, try to suck the life's blood out of their fellow-men at the summer watering-places. That class of people are not those whom I want to talk to now. But I would to-day, as a pastor, earnestly and prayerfully give a few words of practical advice to hard-working people who will spend their vacations away from home. I would try to warn you against the temptations which will confront you, and which, if successful, may destroy your entire Christian character. The leprous germ absorbed into the spiritual body in a day, may continue to work its malformations clear on down to the grave and change your whole eternal destiny.

Summer Red-light the first: Beware of Sabbath Desecration

That means, beware that you do not heedlessly unarmor yourselves by one false move, and leave your beating hearts defenceless before the poisoned arrows of the Satanic archers. Beware that you do not practically say to the evil tempters, "Here am I off on my summer vacation. I have left my religion at home. I am ready to let you lead me where you will. For two or three weeks, or one month at least, I will enter no church, listen to no sermon, utter no public prayer, and ask for no divine protection. I will take a holiday from religion as well as from business, and as a beginning, I will disregard the Lord's Day."

"What do you mean by such a warning as that?" some one asks. "Why do you place such emphasis upon Sabbath observance?" Because, my friend, the way you generally start your summer vacation is the way you will end it. How? In all probability your summer vacation will start on a Saturday afternoon. How will you spend your first day in the country? Will you do it with prayer and consecration? Will you do it by taking your children to the Sunday School and joining the Christian Workers of that neighborhood in public worship within the four walls of the little village church? Or will you do it by coming down in your fishing togs, or by waving your golf-stick, or with your baskets full of food for a rollicking time in the woods on a Sunday picnic? Here are the two extremes. Which will you choose? The one heads towards spiritual renovation. The other heads towards spiritual death. No man or woman ever lived who could successfully resist the temptations of our summer resorts who started their vacations by breaking the law of God's sacred Sabbath. Such a church member always comes back to his church home a moral cripple after he has spent the Sabbath days of his summer vacation in handling the tiller of a sail-boat, or in hitting the little white balls over the golf links, or in looking at the bobber floating at the end of a line attached to a fishing-pole. Start your vacation aright for God, and it will end right. Start it by praying in the village pew for divine guidance. Start it, if possible, by helping the village choir sing in the choir loft. Start it as you would like to start it if the first Sabbath of your summer vacation was to be your first Sabbath in heaven.

The Fascinating Dance

Summer Red-light the second: Beware of the hotel ball-room, and the summer public dance-hall. I am not now discussing the question of dancing, in general; I am now considering whether it be right or wrong for the young folks, within the quietude and the sacred precincts of a home, to have one of their number finger the ivory keys of the piano. Then, while the stately strains of the minuet or the lancers sound forth, to have the boys and the girls join hands, and the slippered feet keep step to the swifter or slower beating of the music. We do know that Miriam danced before the Lord. Perhaps there may be times in the home, when the dance may be a harmless amusement. It may be the means of a harmless frolic, and the means of keeping the children at home, where the fathers and mothers, and grandfather and grandmother, may be participants in the domestic merriment. But though I am not now denouncing the harmless social enjoyments which take place in the home, I do most vehemently protest against the promiscuous dance-hall at our summer watering-places. I know of what I am speaking. I am not a stranger to the social etiquette of this world. With my parents, I have lived all my life in the cities, and have summered in Bar Harbor, Saratoga, White Sulphur Springs, Asheville, Asbury Park, Martha's Vineyard, and many other notable summer resorts. I have associated during those vacations, with the rich and the poor alike. And I believe the hotel ball-room, and the summer dance-hall, are among the most awful cesspools of mental, physical, and spiritual destruction. They are the places where the young men and the young women from the very best of homes, are often irresistibly drawn into a life of worldliness, of sin, and of eternal death. Men and women whom I address to-day: I defy you to find one man or woman of noted spiritual power, who will contend that the summer ball-room is a safe place in which to allow our sons and daughters to pass the summer months. I defy you to find one young man or woman who ever learned the lesson of Christ-love in the fetid atmosphere of a public dance-hall.

A Fatal Dissipation

The public ball-room of the summer vacation can aptly be termed the place for the "Dance of Death." William H. Ainsworth, the famous English novelist, once gave a description of such a dance. It was during the famous plague which devastated the city of London a few centuries ago. The homes of thousands and tens of thousands were deserted. Thousands upon thousands were dying. Thousands upon thousands were dead. The dead-carts used to make their rounds every day. The drivers, seated upon their piles of stenchful corpses, would call from street to street, "Bring out, bring out your dead!" The decomposed corpses would be brought out, and the drivers would throw them upon their carts, as a scavenger might toss a dead dog into his wagon. During that awful plague, many of the young people rifled the wine-cellars of the homes of the wealthy citizens. They took possession of the deserted cathedrals. They turned the churches into dance-halls. They danced and drank during the nights. They danced and drank during the day. When one of their number would fall in the dance, the dancers would stop and lift up the dying man or woman, and carry the body out of the room to await the arrival of the death-cart. It was an awful time. But if we could look below the surface and know the subsequent lives of some of those dancers whirling around the summer ball-rooms, we should find that the fatalities physical, moral and spiritual, are almost as appalling as in that great plague. The summer ball-room has not even the excuse of physical benefit. Is it not a place for physical death? Can our boys and girls go there and dance until after midnight, and expose themselves as they do, and return to the cities strong men and women? Do not consumptions and pneumonias, and fatal physical diseases of all sorts, hover about every public dance-hall?

Is not the public dance-hall of the summer vacation the place also of moral death? We are very careful with whom our children associate in the city. Are you justified in letting that young man, about whom you know practically nothing, speak what he would into the ears of your young daughter, as he moves about in the fascinating dance? People may call me hyper-critical. They may say I am trying to stop our young people from having fun. But I say that any place which has done the physical and moral damage the summer dance-hall has done, our children ought to be forbidden to enter. I am not so much afraid that our young folks may enter the low halls of evil resort as I am that they may enter the vestibules which will lead them into those Satanic dens. I firmly believe that the summer dance-hall is the place where, during the next few months, thousands upon thousands of our young people will have their souls destroyed forever.

Germs of Gambling

Summer Red-light, the third: Beware of all games of chance. What does that mean? Beware of joining the gambling game, which will be played every night in the side-room of the hotel which opens into the hotel bar, which game will be kept up until three or four o'clock in the morning? Beware of commingling with the "plungers" gathered before the bookmakers' stand at the famous summer races? Oh no; I would no more expect you to be found in such flagrantly compromising positions, than you would expect to find your pastor there. But beware of the insidious beginnings. Beware of wagering the box of candy upon the game of tennis or quoits, which is played in the hotel grounds. Beware of betting the penny upon the simple game which is played upon the hotel porch. In other words, beware of taking your first lessons in one of the awful, the most fascinating, and the most destructive of all evils, the gambling evil.

When the poisonous desires of a game of chance are once inoculated into a young man's heart, there seems to be no human power to stop him from committing mental, physical, and spiritual suicide. Senator Chauncey M. Depew, of New York City, whom even the most liberally-minded men would not charge with being a bigot, once gave this startling testimony: "A considerable proportion of failures in business, and ninety per cent. of the defalcations, thefts, and ruin of youths among those who are employed in places of trust, are due directly to gambling. I have seen, in my vast employment, so much misery caused by the head of the family squandering his savings in a policy shop, and promising young men led astray in a small way and finally becoming fugitives, or landing in the criminal dock, that I have come to believe that the community which licenses and tolerates public gambling cannot have prosperity in business." With such an impressive warning as that before us, can we afford to trifle with this sin in even the smallest way? The policy shop or the slot machine is only a step from the roulette table and the race track. The race track and the roulette table are the threatening rocks where thousands upon thousands of human crafts are wrecked for time and for eternity. Trifle not with the games of chance, however small the wager, any more than you would play about a rattlesnake's fang, or toy with a boa constrictor's coils, or a tiger's claw.

Heartless Flirtation

Summer Red-light the fourth: Beware of trifling with human affections. That means, do not be a flirt. Do not falsify with the glance of the eye, or the smile of the lip, or the touch of the hand. Do not imagine that you can treat the delicate instrument of the human heart as a mere temporary plaything, thumping and banging it and snapping its many silver strings, and indulge the belief that it can afterwards be re-tuned and made capable of sending forth sweet music. That means do not trifle with the beautiful diamond of love, and plunge it into the satanic fires of a summer flirtation, and then hope it will have lost none of its lustre. It will not retain its purity. It will become as black and hideous as the filthy piece of charcoal which the servant tosses into the grate on a winter night. It will become as black as the fatal line on Cain's forehead, which marked him out to all the people of his time as a destroyer of his brother's life.

Oh, the fascinations, and yet the hellish malforming power of a summer flirtation! Have you ever sat upon a hotel porch, and watched the insects gather out of

Finland's Best Beloved Poet

N the far remote regions of northern and eastern Finland, where to-day the people are fighting with famine for their lives, three-quarters of a century ago, a man was traveling around, dropping into the huts of peasants, sitting by the fireside of the aged, rowing on the lakes with the fishermen, and following the flocks with the shepherds.

Who was he, and what was he doing there? Was he, haps, dealing out substantial aid to the poor people, he the many messengers who are traveling through e same regions to-day? No—the circumstances were en reversed. The peasants were then the givers, and the receiver. His name was Elias Lonnrot, and the llection of the ancient songs of the Finns was his par-ular business.

ELIAS LONNROT

From an Authentic Portrait of the Famous Poet

Elias Lonnrot was born April 9, 1802, on a farm of aikkari, of the parish Sammatti, in southern Finland. e entered the University of Abo in 1822, and ten years er received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from e University of Helsingfors. The following year he as appointed district physician in Kayana, a town in rthern Finland.

At that time some of the poems circulating among e Finnish people had already been collected by other nnish scholars, especially Zacharias Topelius, another practicing physician. Dr. Lonnrot eagerly studied those poems, and soon he noticed that there was a singular coherency between them, and decided that they were mere fragments of a complete whole. He was soon convinced that there was, in the mouths of the people, a treasure which was only waiting for some one to come and take care of. So he decided to devote his time to the collection of those valuable poems, and it was high time to do so, because the songs were rapidly disappearing with the increasing civilization. Even then, there were very few who could sing those poems, viz.: the very aged only, the younger generation not having learnt them as their fathers did before them.

The regions where most of the poems were collected were not even inside the limits of geographical Finland. The people living in the Russian Karjala, beyond the eastern boundary of Finland, are of the Finnish race, and it was among these people that Dr. Lonnrot made his best harvest. In this respect the parson of Vuokkiniemi is to be mentioned among the first. Lonnrot visited those regions several times, and on these journeys, the poems, afterward published under the name "Kalevala," were collected.

These journeys, through wild fens, forests and marshes, Lonnrot described with great enthusiasm in the Helsingfors Morgenblad, a newspaper published in the Swedish language in Helsingfors, 1833-1835. One story of special interest is the one told by an old peasant, who was by far the most prolific singer Lonnrot ever met on these journeys. These are Lonnrot's words about him: "The man was at that time, eighty years of age. However, he had an exceptionally fine memory. For more than two days he kept me continually busy in writing the poems. He sang them in good order without any interruptions. He was very delightful in the recollection of the days of his childhood, and of his father, long ago deceased, and from whom he had learnt and inherited the poems. 'When we were fishing on the shore of Lake Lapukka,' he once said to me, exaggeratingly, 'there you ought to have been. We had a helper from Lapukka, a good singer, too, but not to be compared with my father. Many nights through they sang together, and never a song twice. I was then a little boy, and just listened to them, so learning the best songs. But I have forgotten a great deal of them. No one of my sons will be a singer after my death, as I was after my father's. The people don't care for the old songs any more, as they did in the days of my youth. Instead of that, the young people now-a-days are chanting their indecent songs, with which I would not like to profane my lips. If somebodythen, like you now, were collecting poems, he would not have been able to write in two weeks the poems my father could sing.'"

The poems thus collected by Lonnrot on these journeys he put together and finished. In the year 1835 they were published by the Finnish Literary Society, under the name "Kalevala." It contained the adventures of the Finnish people, its deepest wisdom and experience of life; its conjectures on the origin of things and of the mysteries of nature; in fact, the entire folk-lore of the nation, all described in most fascinating poetry.

A new morning dawned for the Finnish people and its literature. The civilized world soon recognized that, living in the icy regions of Europe, there was a nation which was to be credited with contributing a precious pearl to the world's literature.

Lonnrot was not satisfied with what he had accomplished. He continued his journeys, and his example was followed by others, and in this way the work was completed, and in 1849 the second and revised edition of "Kalevala" was published. This was the mature form of the epic. It contains fifty runes, with 22,800 lines. Besides this, Lonnrot on his journeys collected a great many lyric poems, wizard-incantations, proverbs and problems of the early Finns. The lyric poems were published in 1840, under the name "Kanteletar."

As a reward for his great accomplishment in the field of Finnish literature, Lonnrot was elected Professor of Finnish language and literature at the University of Helsingfors, in 1853. In 1862 he withdrew from this post of honor, thereafter devoting his entire time to the cultivation of Finnish literature. He died March 18, 1884, at the age of eighty-two.

POET LONNROT'S BIRTHPLACE

It might be well to mention here that the "Kalevala" is translated into several languages. An elaborate English translation is by John Martin Crawford (published by Robert Clarke Co., Cincinnati, O.).

UMMER RED-LIGHTS

e darkness, and buzz and play about the electric hts? Those lights have for them the fatal spell that e glittering eye of the black-snake has for the mother rd, sitting upon the edge of her nest. These insects ill circle round and round the brilliant light. They ill disappear for awhile, as though they know the hot ngue of death is ready to touch them. Then at last ey will make one plunge, and, in an instant, the wings d the legs are gone. Then the poor suffering creares fall to the ground, wriggling, and twisting, and ring, to be trampled under the foot of man. Such are e awful results which follow, when the human insects ay about the hissing, blasting fires of a summer's rtation. It may be pleasant for awhile to feel the hot ush upon the cheek. It may seem only fun to pass a w hours as a coquette, tearing and inflaming the tenerest feelings of a true man in a summer row-boat, or romantic walks through the woods. It may seem to e a glorious act to boast how many you can conquer love, as an Indian warrior boasts of his prowess in ar, by the number of scalps he carries at his belt. ut by the scorched, and bruised, and mutilated hearts f thousands, which have been malformed for time and ernity in the glowing flames of a summer flirtation, I enounce trifling with human love. I denounce it before e young people who may be participants, during their ext summer vacation, in this merciless, heartless, and amning universal evil.

Summer Red-light the fifth: Beware of the serpent hich lies coiled up in the bewitching wine-cup. A few mmer and winter resorts of this country are especialy noted for the power of their mineral waters to physially straighten a man out after a long debauch. Not any miles from Chicago, there is a resort where many f our drunkards go at least once a year. I have been old by some of these drunkards, that it is impossible drink whiskey, and, at the same, drink of those mineral prings. But though there are a few, a very few summer watering-places whose waters have these curative ualities, most of our summer watering-places are noted r the fact that they make drunkards, rather than reform them. They make them in wholesale quantities and not in retail. Men carry their bottles of intoxicating beverages when they go fishing, or dancing, or taking a tramp in the woods, and men drink everywhere.

But this is not the greatest curse for which our summer resorts are famous. They are noted as places where women get drunk, as well as the men. To me the most abjectly repulsive creature on earth is a drunken woman. When I see one, I know not which feeling predominates most in my heart, that of pity or of horror. I remember distinctly the first drunken woman I ever saw. It was at a summer watering-place near Bar Harbor. I saw scores of them there under the influence of drink. Some of them had diamonds upon their fingers and jewels at their throats, and their clothes were bought at the most expensive establishments, but they were excited with intoxicating liquor. You could tell it by the flush on the cheek, by the strange glassiness of the eye, by the boisterousness of the laugh, and by the many signs that always mark the effects of drink. In our summer hotels, women now drink everywhere. Therefore, friends, I beg of you, when you are in a summer party where wine is passed around, do not touch it. For your Christian example's sake, do not touch it. For the danger of inflaming your own evil tastes, do not touch it. Stand back from the evil wine-cup, though it may be offered to you by the jeweled hand of a hostess, or by the companion who pretends he is your friend. The tempter may not be able to enslave you in a city where you are in active work, but he may be able to dig for you a drunkard's grave among the many sinful summer fascinations of a hotel piazza.

Summer Red-light the last: Beware of the family separations, which take away for any length of time, wives from husbands; husbands from wives; brothers from sisters, and parents from children. Where do you say you are going this summer? "Well," you answer, "I do not know. I have not yet made up my mind. I would like to go down to the seashore if I could, but that is so far away. My husband and boys could be with me only a little while, if I did go there." Mother, wife, I would not go far away from home if I were you. If your husband, and boys, and brothers have to work during the summer, to earn you a livelihood, it is not good to be separated from them. It is not good for you. It is not good for the husband and the boys. Mark this, my friends, and what I say: I speak calmly and deliberately: Nine-tenths of all the evil temptations of our summer resorts are, directly or indirectly, due to the separations of families. These separations lay temptations, awful temptations, at the feet of the men who are compelled to stay at home and work. They lay temptations, awful temptations, at the feet of the women who are off in the summer hotels. Go to a summer resort near to your home. Be in a place where all the members of the family can get together every few days. Never let your husband learn the lesson, how to be happy without you and the children. Wives and mothers, never learn yourselves the lesson, how you can be happy without your husbands and the children by your side. As far as you may be able, during the years of your earthly life, never be separated from your loved ones for any length of time, until you are compelled to lay them away for the last sleep, in a new-made grave.

In closing, I would speak to you words of congratulation and good cheer. Before we separate for the summer months, I would say, men and women, I congratulate you, because you have well earned your rest. I congratulate you, because you have finished a hard winter's work. I congratulate you that you are going out among the trees and the flowers and the mountains and the valleys; that you are going to drink out of the cool spring, and see the cows gather for the evening milking. And I also congratulate you that the Saviour I love whom you worship here, you can worship there. I say along the Saviour's companionship. Pray during the next few weeks for divine protection and help. I say, if you have Christ along, there will be no fear that you will succumb to the evil temptations which beset everyone during a summer vacation.

A LITTLE MOUNTAIN MAID MOUNTAIN CHILDREN GOING TO SCHOOL A NORTH CAROLINA "LIGHTNING EXPRESS"

Sweet Hymns in the Forest

A Unique Educational Experiment Among the Mountain Children of North Carolina

ONE of the home missionary problems which confronts Christian people nowadays, is how to give to the isolated, neglected people of our Southern mountains the spiritual and intellectual training which they so badly need. Scattered among the beautiful hills and valleys of the southern appalachians, and cut off from intimate connection with the outside world, the condition of these mountaineers is one of stagnation. Nevertheless, in spite of all drawbacks and unprogressiveness, the quality of their children's minds is such that they only need the aid, encouragement, and instruction of the Christian teacher and pastor, to develop into citizens of whom this country will be proud.

Less than two years ago, a movement was begun in a modest and unassuming way, in the interest of the young mountain children, living in the highlands of Burke County, N. C. The wretched condition of the natives of this locality had often appealed to the good people of Morganton, and the Presbyterians began to consider the question of establishing a school, by using for that purpose a dilapitated old building which had once been a hotel. They were, however, pinched for means, and tried to interest friends in the North. They laid the matter before a good Christian lady, Mrs. Marguerite S. Grant, a resident of Summit, N. J., who had already done much for the Waldensians at Valdese, N. C., and she generously decided to help them. She leased the property, and then communicated with the Rev. R. D. Schoonmaker, who consented to become connected with the work. The old building was repaired, and furnished in a simple way. Soon the workers won the confidence of the Burke county mountain folk, through preaching the Gospel, practicing medicine gratuitously, and doing a good deal of charitable work among the neediest. Meetings were held regularly on Sundays, and were well attended; the services being of a simple, evangelical character. In October last, a school was opened with seventeen pupils. Soon the attendance grew to thirty-five, with an enrollment of about sixty. A Princeton graduate, Mr. Herbert Moore, assisted in teaching. In addition to the regular studies, which include the usual branches, it is the aim of the school to develop character in the students, and to aid them in the direction of a moral and social uplift. It was working with the raw material; but it was full of encouragement. Hidden away in the mountains of these Southern States, are thousands of young people growing up without secular or religious education, but who have in them the qualities of which good American citizens are made, and to help them to become good, earnest, self-supporting Christian men and women, has been the sole aim of the work from the beginning.

Speaking of the mountain youth, the Rev. Mr. Schoonmaker says: "I have never seen more distressed and neglected youngsters even in the slums of New York. Their complexions were of the color of putty, and their lips bloodless; nobody knows what sort of life these children of the wilderness have lived. We carried our little baby organ outside, and there, for the first time in their lonely lives, these little people heard the strains of sweet music and hymns, and listened to the 'old, old story of Jesus and his love.' All about us, hidden by the dense foliage of the summer forests, were the little, one-roomed, windowless log cabins, in which whole families dwelt, and which they call 'home.' And they love their tiny structures, and the home instinct is very strong. What happy faces greeted us when we opened school! Think of it! They were going to get 'eddicated'—a thing which, for generations back, had never been known in these regions. And how eager they were for education. Some of them tramp three miles to school, and they are only six years old at that!"

As an illustration of the poverty of the mountaineers proper, Mr. Schoonmaker relates this incident: "One of our most faithful youngsters did not come to school one day, so the next day we questioned her as to the reason. ''Cause I had no rations all day,' she said, simply. In other words, the little one had had nothing to eat the whole day previous. This is no uncommon experience. A few yams or sweet potatoes they regard as a bounteous meal."

"We have awakened hope in these people. They actually have something to live for. One of the most interesting phases of our work has been the Bible Class which assembles every evening for study and prayer. We were given some Bibles by the American Bible Society, and each pupil who could read was assigned one. How they loved to read in them! Often after school hours they can be seen poring over their pages.

"Situated in the very heart of the mountain forests the big, old rambling schoolhouse is destined to play an important part in the lives of many of the neglected boys and girls. It is the only place of its kind within a radius of hundreds of square miles. It has fifty-four rooms, a plot of some three hundred acres of land, and abundant water and fuel. In the two large school rooms are over three hundred square feet of blackboard, together with tables, benches, books, pictures, etc. There are seven living rooms, a study room, music room, two kitchens, a big dining-room, and a student's library. Up to the present time, the entire work has been supported by the incomes of the two principals and the gifts of a few personal friends. To place it on a firm financial footing, and to enlarge its facilities, so that it may meet the growing needs of the work and become a real power for good among the youth of that mountain region, it needs the generous support of all who have a heart the cause of these neglected little ones. It is a work in which the social, educational and spiritual are so combined as to produce the best results."

Mr. Schoonmaker states that already the demand for admissions is far beyond anything that could have been anticipated. The building could be filled with mountain children, were the means available. A matron is needed; many of the rooms are unfurnished; two, and possibly three, more teachers are absolutely necessary. One hundred pupils could be housed there. Besides, it is desired to add to the teaching branches of agriculture, blacksmithing, shoemaking, cooking, sewing, and other industries that will enable the children to become wage-earners. It is not the policy of the institution to pauperize the children. They are always expected to do something in return for their education, even if it be only to give a small equivalent in labor or produce. Some of the boys cut firewood; some of the girls "work their way" by sweeping and keeping the place bright and clean. But there are many valuable opportunities for training on lines of usefulness and self-support, which cannot be made available for the lack of funds.

The only way to help these people is to live among them. Character cannot be made in a day; it takes time. Let us help to give these people religious and educational privileges and God will surely bless the effort.

Any reader of this journal who may wish to aid this deserving work may communicate with Rev. R. D. Schoonmaker, Glen Alpine Springs School, Brindletown, Burke County, N. C., who will answer all inquiries.

LOOKING N. E. FROM KANSAS AVE. TOWARD N. TOPEKA

SENDING AID TO THOSE IN PERIL

AT THE DOOR OF VAN ORTS & SOUTH TOPEKA

MANY VICTIMS OF THE WESTERN FLOODS

Six Illinois Cities Inundated, Lives Lost, and Many Thousands Rendered Temporarily Homeless — The Work of Relief

ALTHOUGH the good people of Topeka and Kansas City, Kan., now that the waters of the swollen Kaw and Missouri Rivers are receding, have begun to take a more hopeful view of the situation than they did a week ago, there is still a great deal of suffering in both cities. Writing from Topeka to the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Pastor C. M. Sheldon says: "The real extent of the disaster is not yet known by any of us. Topeka is divided into two parts by the Kaw River. The south side was not affected by the flood, but the north side, containing about 10,000 people, was completely submerged. Many people were drowned, and the entire number of inhabitants rendered homeless for the time being. Many houses have been completely swept away, and the damage to property is beyond computation. The city is at present taking care of these 10,000 people, caring for them in public halls, churches, etc., and has rallied very generously with money and supplies. But, in addition to this great loss to the people here, there is a general condition of suffering all over the State, such as we have never known, sufficiently large to call out a proclamation by the Governor.

"I was authorized by the Commercial Club of Topeka, which has taken the lead in organization, to ask aid from any friends outside who might be willing to help. It is safe to say that thousands of people in Topeka will lose everything, and the churches on the north side are in very great need.

"A large part of the money that I receive from outside sources I shall try to use in the re-establishment of the religious and educational work of the city, where it has been affected. Topeka would not have turned to the outside world for help, if it had not felt unable to cope with the situation. Whatever THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can do will be very gratefully received, and if we have more than can be well used here, we will simply pass it on to the thousands of suffering farmers and citizens in other parts of the State. The money loss is estimated anywhere from thirty-five to fifty millions of dollars. Thousands of farmers have lost all their stock, together with their crops, and in many cases in the valley, their entire farms. The situation has been called the worst that we have ever known, even in drought and grasshopper times, and it is described by the Governor in his proclamation as 'a great disaster.'"

An idea of the state of Topeka's streets, while the flood was at its height, may be gathered from the photographs on this page. Fortunately, the immediate danger is past, but weeks must elapse before normal conditions are fully restored.

In Kansas City, Kan., the situation is likewise improving. Dr. Stemen, Asst. Chief McConnell and others are prominent in the relief work. Chief of Police Zimmer ordered all the saloons to be closed. The flood refugees are still in tents at Camp Gettysburg (so called in honor of Captain Getty, who is directing that part of the work). In the flooded district many of the houses are utterly destroyed and the furniture irreparably damaged by the slimy water. Rev. Dr. W. P. George, of the Westminster Congregational Church, Kansas City, Mo., writes of the relief situation in Kansas City, Kan.: "There are two Kansas cities, one rich the other poor; one able to care for itself, the other needing outside help. Kansas City, Kan., had altogether on Saturday evening $20,000 to feed and care for 25,000 people, who have mostly lost everything. They will need continuous assistance for weeks. All the churches, except the Catholic, have opened to afford shelter for the homeless flood refugees."

As the water recedes, at Kansas City and Topeka, bodies are found in the wreckage of the submerged bottoms. Many of the missing, however, are turning up and it is gratifying to learn that the number of those who were supposed to have perished in the floods is less than was reported. Contributions have been received from many quarters for the sufferers, some cities having given liberally; but the needs are far from being supplied and money gifts will be welcomed for many weeks to come, in order that the homeless thousands may be cared for and helped to make a new start in life. Repairs are being pushed on the damaged water works and gas works, and the cities will soon have their usual supply of pure water and illuminating gas. The bridges are also being repaired, some of them being rebuilt almost from the foundations, and the railroads are pushing repairs as rapidly as possible on their dismantled tracks, depots and connections.

On the east side of the Mississippi river the ravages of the flood have been very extensive. Six Illinois cities, with a population of over 80,000, were threatened with almost total submersion. They are East St. Louis, Venice, Madison, Brooklyn, Newport, and Granite City. Inundated by a great rise of the Mississippi, they were so alarmed that thousands deserted their homes and fled to higher ground for a temporary refuge. The levees at Granite, Madison and Venice gave way, and the country for miles around was like a great lake from two to ten feet deep. Mayor Cook of East St. Louis ordered all business suspended and summoned every man to help in fighting back the flood. Merchants and business men assisted in repairing the embankments. All the saloons were closed. People could be seen floating about on rafts, and there were a number of cases of drowning. It was estimated that between twenty and thirty lives were lost in East St. Louis alone. Ten thousand persons were made homeless, and many were so suddenly caught by the flood when the Illinois Central embankment broke that they escaped only in their night clothes.

The flood extended to the business section of the town, and north and east, as far as North street, scores of boats and skiffs were pressed into service in the saving of lives and the rescuing of people who were imprisoned in their homes. Churches, schoolhouses and other public buildings were opened for the shelter of the refugees. Fully eight thousand crossed to the higher land on the other side of the river before the flood attained its maximum height. Every wagon or vehicle of any kind which could be utilized has been pressed into service to remove the household effects of people living in the inundated districts, and many have transferred such of their property as they saved from the flood to the west bank of the Mississippi, where they will live in the future.

On Thursday, June 16th, the river at St. Louis began to fall, and the great danger which threatened East St. Louis became less, but, though the railroad embankments north of the viaduct held, the lowlands between the embankments and the elevated streets were so badly flooded that weeks must elapse before the water entirely disappears. There is acute suffering among the homeless, both food and clothing being greatly needed.

Mayor Cook and Chairman Keechler, of the Relief Committee, issued an appeal to outside cities for aid. The Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, from various sources, received about $20,000 for the relief work. Six thousand destitute persons were being fed daily. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a contribution of $500 to Chairman Keechler, to be added to the relief fund.

Tents have been pitched at Washington Place for the accommodation of the homeless. Many are living in churches and schools, and a number have courageously remained in the upper stories of their dwellings, waiting for the waters to subside, and receiving food by boats. State militia are guarding the city, though martial law has not been proclaimed, and orders have been given to the guards to shoot any one found looting the deserted houses.

On other points along the Mississippi large areas of textile lands have been submerged. Clearyville, New Kaskaskia and Wolfi Lake have all been reported, and many families driven out to higher ground. It is believed, however, that the worst of the flood is now over.

All contributions sent to this Journal for the flood sufferers will be acknowledged and forwarded to Pastor C. M. Sheldon, of Topeka; Mayor Craddock, of Kansas City, Kan., and Mayor Cook, of East St. Louis, to be applied in the relief work in those three cities.

A Liturgical Concession

AMONG the liturgical changes proposed in the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America, recently in session at Asbury Park, N.J., is one in the marriage service, which will be of interest to prospective brides. The proposal, which by the time this page is in the hands of our readers will probably have been adopted, is to omit the word "obey" from the answer of the bride to the question of the officiating minister at the marriage. If she desires to be married in the Reformed Church, she will no longer be required to pledge herself to obey the man to whom she is being married. She may, of course, make any pledges in private that her future husband may demand, but the church will no longer make the giving of that pledge a condition of solemnizing the union. This is certainly a concession to the fair sex, and should make the Reformed Church a popular one with brides.

What will be the effect of the change in family life? Probably there will be some pessimists who will predict all kinds of evil results. We doubt, however, whether any mischief will accrue. It must be an ill-assorted union, in which the restraint of the pledge has to be applied. Unhappily, there are many instances in which the husband knows that it would be useless to issue a command, and that even his expressed wishes will be disregarded, if they are opposed to his wife's inclinations. But in cases of that kind, it has been found that the promise of obedience, though solemnly given at the altar, has no restraining influence. Experience has proved very clearly that obedience cannot be insured from a determined woman, by a definite pledge. The husband has had to rely on her love for him, her respect for his judgment, and a tactful management of his case for carrying his point, when there has been divergence. All these resources will still be at his disposal, and he will probably lose no real power by the concession the church has made to his wife's dignity.

A New Anti-Mormon Crusade

IT is announced in the columns of our daily contemporaries, that a new movement has been inaugurated by the International Council of Women for Christian and Patriotic Purposes, with the object of unseating Senator Reed Smoot, the Mormon apostle. Mrs. Darwin R. James, who represents 200,000 American women, many of them belonging to the influential class, is now in Utah, personally investigating the Mormon situation. It is understood that a campaign of education, on a most extensive scale, is contemplated, and that next fall will witness the opening of a fight which will far eclipse, in magnitude and interest, the famous movement to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave impulse and direction several years ago, and which resulted in the exclusion of Brigham H. Roberts from the House of Representatives.

That the Mormon question is one which, sooner or later, the nation will have to deal with, is everywhere admitted. It is useless to deny the fact that the Mormons are making remarkable headway, or that their propaganda is conducted with the utmost skill and success in many States. "Celestial marriage," as a principle, is kept steadily in view, as a part of the blasphemous Mormon creed. In a recent interview, had by J. Martin Miller, a Washington correspondent, with President Joseph Smith, the head of the Mormon Church, the latter made some very remarkable admissions. We quote from the report in a Newark, N. J. paper:

"I have five wives and five families, aggregating forty-two children—twenty-one sons and twenty-one daughters. I am living with one wife, my home is with her. I visit the other four occasionally and support them and their children. I do not believe there is any one in the whole country who would have any regard for any man in my position who would cast his wives and children aside and not care for them."

"The church, by virtue of President Woodruff's manifesto of 1890, suspended or abolished plural marriages, did it not?" he was asked.

"Yes, it did. In 1890, at the time of President Woodruff's manifesto, there were 2,451 polygamic families, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, in the United States. In October, 1899, this number had been reduced, as follows: By death, 750; by removal beyond the confines of the Republic, 63; by divorce, 95; leaving 1,543. On May 1, 1901, it was ascertained that the original number had been reduced by 1,564, or sixty-three per cent., leaving only 897, and that the great majority are of advanced age."

"How many polygamists were there at the last enumeration?"

"The number of polygamists living in Utah on May 1, 1902, was 756. It is safe to estimate that this number has been reduced during the last year at least five per cent., so that now there should not be to exceed 718 men in Utah having plural wives.

"I believe that God revealed to Joseph Smith the doctrine of celestial marriage. That which is thus sealed on earth is sealed in heaven, and the family union thus formed, if lived up to in righteousness, will continue in the world to come, and abide forever."

This is a clear and explicit statement, from the head of the Mormon Church, of the views held by that church at the present time concerning the doctrine of "celestial marriages." It proves that the old doctrines of Brigham Young still survive. As far as the outward compliance with law—the living with but one wife—is concerned, it may be reasonably expected that the Mormons, leaders and people, will see to it that the church and its adherents are kept technically safe from attack. If evidence can be adduced that President Smith, and a number of his apostles are "still practising polygamy," as the anti-Mormon leaders in Utah assert, the whole question may be revived in the United States Courts, and may have an incidental if not a direct bearing upon the case of Senator Smoot.

Are the Mormons submitting to the law of the land, and is polygamy gradually expiring? Or, is submission a mere pretence, while plural marriage is still secretly practised in Utah? Herein lies the whole question at issue. If the Council of Women, co-operating with their allies in Utah, succeed in bringing the actual existing conditions to light, in a manner so thorough as to remove all doubt, they will have rendered valuable public service indeed.

A Hindoo's Testimony

OUR readers have a personal interest in a retort, which is made by a Hindoo now visiting this country, in a vigorous letter to the New York Tribune, to another Hindoo, whose strictures on Christianity had been published in the same journal. Mr. Naidu, a Ceylon merchant, had declared that Christianity was in no respect superior to the Vedantism taught in India, and also that it was doubtful whether Christian missionaries in India have done any good. Perhaps Mr. Naidu was not aware that there was another native of India here, who could speak with equal authority. It may thus have been a surprise to him, as it must have been gratifying to Christian readers of the Tribune, to read the conclusive answer sent to it by Mr. S. L. Joshi, a Maratha-Hindoo now staying in Brooklyn.

Mr. Joshi shows, as only a writer familiar with the subject could do, how far Vedantism falls short of Christianity in its power over the lives of men. It is, however, in his vindication of the missionaries, that Mr. Joshi is on ground familiar to us. Mr. Joshi apologizes for his fellow countryman's ignorance of the missionaries' services, by explaining that in his part of the country he has not seen all that the missionaries are doing. "Had he been," Mr. Joshi says, "on the great Central Indian plain, where two successive famines within ten years, swept millions from existence, and watched the tenderness and devotion with which the missionaries tended the sick and dying and distributed clothes and corn sent by Christian philanthropists, I am sure Mr. Naidu would have thought twice before saying that the missionaries have done no good in India."

Mr. Joshi shows how much Christianity has done in India for women, how much it has done for education and for the removal of social abuses; but it is evident that the exhibition of Christian beneficence in the time of famine had made the deepest impression on his mind. Our readers have a right to rejoice in this testimony. When one Hindoo, arguing with another on the merits of Christianity, cites the beneficence which they rendered, as an argument, a striking proof it afforded that the sacrifices which they made to send food to the starving people, have resulted in raising the character of Christianity in the esteem of the natives of India and in bringing glory to the name of Christ.

Our Children's Home

MONT-LAWN opens this week, and between two and three thousand little waifs of the tenement and slums will enjoy a health-giving and happy outing there between the last week of June and the first week of September.

For nine years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home has opened its gates every summer to these wee tenement folks, the funds for the work being contributed by Christian men and women all over the land, who love the children. Twenty-five thousand little waifs have been welcomed and entertained there in those passing years. Twenty-five thousand young hearts have been filled with gladness by being brought into contact with nature at the most delightful season of the year. A multitude of sad young lives have been brightened, pale cheeks have been healthfully bronzed, and childish lips, that had forgotten how to laugh, have been made to bubble over with merriment and innocent glee.

Mont-Lawn has been aptly called "The Children's Paradise." Reader, have you ever sent a slum child there? Have you had a share in this simple missionary work among the neglected juveniles of the tenements? If not, send one this summer. Send three dollars to our Fresh Air Fund, and you will be paying for a ten days' outing for some little barefooted lad or wee, tod dling girl, who will gratefully remember your kindness "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

Our New Serial

A reader in Elkhart, Ind., sends us this letter:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I write for information concerning Rev. C. M. Sheldon's latest work, "The Narrow Gate," as you have described it. Is it ready

MRS. S. B. W. M.

In reply to the foregoing, and for the information of our readers generally, we would say that Pastor Sheldon's new story, "The Narrow Gate," will begin in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will be run every week thereafter, until concluded. It is the most remarkable story that has yet come from his pen, and deals with phases of society, high and low, in a way that will prove intensely interesting to all classes of readers. As it appears exclusively in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and cannot be had anywhere else, we advise all who wish to enjoy the pleasure and profit of reading what we regard as one of the grandest stories ever written, to be sure not to miss the opening chapters, and to notify their friends as widely as possible, so that they, too, may take advantage of the opportunity. This serial, "The Narrow Gate," we are confident will be universally admitted to be worth more than the subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It is truly a great story written with a great purpose, and it is safe to predict that it will have a world-wide audience.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Servian Tragedy

NEWS of the appalling series of murders which were perpetrated in the royal palace of Belgrade, the capital of Servia, on the morning of June 11, caused a general feeling of horror through the civilized world. The brief report by cable was that the soldiery stationed in Belgrade, had broken into the palace, overpowered the guards, and blowing open the door of the royal apartments with a dynamite bomb, had entered, and slaughtered the king and queen. They then searched the palace for other victims, and finding there the queen's two brothers, killed them also. Simultaneously, the houses of the Premier and two other members of the government were entered, and all three were killed. Conflicting reports of the details of the tragedy were issued, but one of the statements, said to be that of an eye-witness, is that the king, startled by the noise when the soldiers on guard were fighting for their lives, rose from his bed and confronted the officer commanding the attacking troops, and demanded to know the meaning of his intrusion. The officer presented a paper, giving the king the option of banishing the queen, or abdicating the throne. The king's reply was to shoot the officer dead. Another officer then advanced upon him, and the king, with the queen, who, hearing the shots had rushed in, fled to the roof of the palace. The soldiers followed, and there killed them both with horrible brutality. After the whole family had been slaughtered and the three statesmen murdered in their houses, a proclamation was issued, declaring Prince Peter Karageorgevitch King of Servia.

King Alexander, who has thus come to an untimely end, belonged to the Obrenovitch family, and was in his twenty-seventh year. He was the son of King Milan and Queen Natalie, whose reign had been so scandalous and disastrous to Servia, that they abdicated in 1889 in favor of their son. Alexander was, at that time, only thirteen years of age, and for four years the government was conducted by a regency, but on April 13, 1893, the young king, by a conspiracy, seized the reins of government and rid himself of the regency. Shortly afterward he abrogated the constitution and restored an earlier one, which gave him the power to appoint a third of the chamber of deputies. Having made the appointment of men amenable to his wishes, he restored the constitution, which had been suspended for only a few hours. His conduct of the government continued to be erratic, and reports of his personal vices were circulated throughout Europe. A wife was vainly sought for him from the royal houses of Russia, Austria and Montenegro. In 1900 he disgusted his ministers and people by marrying a widow, twelve years his senior, who had been one of his mother's waiting-women, and who bore a bad character. From that time he appeared to be wholly under her influence. Her relatives and friends were advanced to high offices, and the people who opposed her were disgraced. Her conduct aroused violent antipathy, which reached a crisis, when it was rumored that one of her brothers was to be declared heir to the throne. Causes for discontent had multiplied under the king's maladministration, the most dangerous of which was delay in paying the salaries of his military officers. They became alienated from him, and gave ear to the solicitations of the friends of the pretender to the throne, the head of the Karageorgevitch family. When their support was thus lost, the downfall of King Alexander was easily achieved.

The new king is a man of fifty-five years of age, who at the time of the massacre was living quietly at Geneva. His grandfather, Karageorge, was the leader of the Servians in their struggle to throw off the yoke of Turkey. He fought with success from 1804, to 1813, and practically won independence for his country; but the Turks again gained supremacy, and Karageorge had to fly for his life. When by a concert of the European powers, four years later, Servia was finally liberated from Turkish control, Karageorge returned, but the Obrenovitch family had come to the front, and Karageorge was assassinated. His friends, however, have been faithful to his family, and have now succeeded in putting his grandson on the throne.

The final outcome of the revolution is still in doubt. The people of Servia appear to have accepted the situation with complacency, though they took no active part in the movement, which was entirely the work of the politicians and the army. But they shared in the general disgust at the conduct of the king and queen, as they did in that of King Milan, and they may therefore acquiesce in the result of the tragedy, which wipes the dynasty out of existence. Public opinion in Europe takes that view. While the lawlessness and criminality of the tragedy are deplored, there is no regret that a family, so depraved from father to son, has ceased to rule. It is still true as the Hebrew poet declared:

Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish (Ps. 49: 20).

Steamboat Disaster

A grievous loss of life resulted from a steamboat collision near Marseilles, France, on June 7. The steamer Liban with over two hundred passengers on board, was leaving that port for Corsica, and was turning the cape of Maire Island, when the steamer Insulaire of the same line, approaching Marseilles, suddenly loomed in sight. There was some indecision on the part of the captains of both boats as to the course to steer in the critical moment, and the opportunity of escaping collision was lost. The incoming steamer struck the other with a fearful impact, tearing a huge rent in her side. Her own bow was crushed in, and only by the prompt shifting of her cargo astern, to raise the bow out of the water, was she saved from sinking, and reached the harbor in safety. The captain of the Liban was in a worse strait. The water was rushing in such quantities through the hole in the boat's side, that the only chance of saving the lives of the crew and passengers was to run her ashore: but before the boat could be got out of deep water her bow settled and she went to the bottom. About forty persons who were washed off the deck were picked up by vessels which went to the scene, but all the others were carried down with the boat. All might have been saved if, instead of clinging to the sinking ship, they had cast themselves into the sea. Doubtless they would not have listened if some one had urged them to do so. It would have seemed like suicide. Preachers and Christian workers are often unable to induce men who are in danger of losing their souls to come out from the world and give themselves to Christ, who is waiting to save them.

For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it (Mark 8: 35).

Died for His Family

A singularly pathetic death occurred in New York a few days ago. It was that of a Jewish tailor, who came to this country some months ago from Bessarabia, in Russia, the district in which the Kishineff massacre took place. He left behind him his wife and five daughters. He obtained work soon after his arrival, and began to save money to pay their passage money to this country. When he heard of the slaughter at Kishineff, he grew more concerned than ever for the safety of his loved ones, and redoubled his efforts to raise the sum necessary to bring them to America. He gave up his lodging, and induced his employer to let him sleep on some rags spread on the bench, which he occupied in the day. His food, always of the cheapest, he cut down in quantity, until his emaciated appearance was pitiful. He succeeded in saving over thirty dollars toward the sum required; but hard work and insufficient nourishment combined had a fatal effect. One morning last week his fellow-workmen, coming to their work, found him extended on his bench in a state of collapse. An ambulance was summoned, but he died before it reached the hospital. The doctors who examined him, reported that his death was due to voluntary starvation. Every one must admire such heroism, but how few are moved when they hear that, in order to save them from destruction and make it possible for them to enter heaven, Christ laid down his life.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends (John 15: 13).

A Prince Assaulted

Prince Ye, who is a son of the Emperor of Corea and is now a student at the Ohio Wesleyan University, went with his secretary, Ewaha, to Stratford Park, a summer resort near Columbus, O., a few days ago, and were strolling through the park, when they were met by a young man who was under the influence of liquor. He conceived the idea of attacking the two foreigners, who, he supposed, were Chinamen. He struck the Prince in the mouth. The secretary interfered and received similar treatment. The injured foreigners were taken to Delaware, where their injuries were attended to, and their assailant was arrested. The condition of the Prince was such that he was compelled to take to his bed. This is his first year at the university, where he is popular. It may be hoped that the young foreigners will be made aware that their assailant does not fairly represent his people. He is one of those men who disgrace us in the eyes of the people to whom we send our missionaries. He belongs to the class whose misconduct is peculiarly heinous, because they bring a reproach not only upon our civilization but upon the cause of Christ. It was to such as he that the great Leader addressed his appeal:

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of the heathen (Neh. 5: 9).

THE LATE KING ALEXANDER OF SERVIA

THE LATE QUEEN DRAGA OF SERVIA

BRIEF NOTES

A conference of Hebrew Christians, will be held at Mountain Lake Park, Md., July 24-31. The signers of the call are Rev. Louis Mayer and Rev. A. R. Kuhlell.

Hon. Charles W. Kohlsaat, Special Commissioner of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition to Sweden and Norway has been appointed by His Majesty, the King of Sweden, a Commander of the Royal Order of the Vasa.

The Salvation Army has acquired a fine property at Spring Valley, N. Y., about thirty miles from New York city. It cost $18,000, and includes a large house and about seventy acres of good land. The army proposes to send there summer guests for a week or two of fresh air, and possibly to establish an orphanage.

The New Testament has been translated into Hebrew-German (Yiddish) by Marcus S. Bergman, of 241 Brompton Road, London, England, and large quantities are being sold. It is also shown a keen interest in the book. It is printed in Roman letters without points or punctuation. It is said that many Jews who speak English are unable to read anything but Yiddish, and it is hoped by this means to give them the Gospel.

MONT-LAWN READY FOR THE WAIFS

Over Two Hundred Happy Tenement Tots will be taken there this Week

THE gates of "The Children's Paradise" are about to open. On Friday, of this week, the first contingent of happy tenement waifs will be conveyed thither, from the hot city, by the Hudson River steamer, Chrystenah, which in the past nine years has safely transported 25,000 poor city children to our beautiful Fresh Air Home, in the Rockland County hills. On the afternoon of that day, the first contingent of a hundred children will assemble in the Bible House, for "doctor's examination," after which they will be conveyed by the cross town trolley to the steamboat wharf, foot of W. Tenth street, North River, where they will embark on the Chrystenah. The children are marshalled in parties, each under the direction of an experienced caretaker, who accompanies them to Mont-Lawn. Arriving at Nyack, they will be put on our Mont-Lawn stages, and driven through the little village and along the lovely road that leads up to the Home—a drive of about two and a-half miles.

What fun and frolic, what laughter and merriment, will mark that red-letter pilgrimage! With spirits bubbling over in anticipation of the pleasures in store, they will at last reach the entrance gates to Mont-Lawn, and will scamper up the graveled path, and out on the wide terrace. After they have eaten—for the sail and drive, always give our children a keen appetite—they will have an hour or two left for a frolic at the "scupps" or among the grounds (think of thirty acres for a playground!) and then—to bed in the little snow-white cots, to sleep until morning.

Each successive day will witness the arrival of a fresh contingent, until the Home is full and Housemother Collins has all the little charges she can accommodate.

We shall keep our readers duly informed of the children's doings at Mont-Lawn this summer, and they themselves shall be, in large part, the chroniclers. In their own simple language, they will tell to those friends, in letters which will appear from time to time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the story of their outing.

Our mail this week has been full of kind words of encouragement from the friends of the children. We give below extracts from a few of the letters received, which show how deep and sincere is the love of our readers for the children and their sympathy with the poor little tenement waifs:

THREE OF THESE ARE TENEMENT CHILDREN, WHO GO TO MONT-LAWN THIS WEEK

Rev. W. Y. and Mrs. Y., Bingham Lake, Minn., sends $6 "to aid in sending two of the most needy little children you can find for an outing to Mont-Lawn. May God's richest blessing attend them and also upon you in your noble cause."

Mr. E. W. S., Okolona, Miss., writes: "Please find enclosed check for $6 for the Mont-Lawn Fresh Air Fund. This is sent for my little four-year-old son, Clifford M. Savage, Jun."

"One who loves the little children," Camden, Mich., sends $1, and adds: "I am greatly interested in those little children and wish I could do more."

"Mrs. H. P. S., Chicago, writes, "I want to add my mite for the children ($2) wish it was much more. God bless you in your labor of love."

"I enclose $3, to pay for a ten days' outing for a little tenement boy or girl, in Jesus' name," is the kind message from E. S. T., Block Island, Rhode Island.

"I wish to have a part in sending some of the poor little city waifs to the country. Enclosed please find $6 to send two little ones to Mont-Lawn. Yours in Christ's service," writes Miss Mary N., Elba, Neb., whose offering will bring joy to two little hearts this summer.

Mrs. L. A. C., Owega, N. Y., sends $6, "which Mrs. E. B. Clarke wishes to be given to the Fresh Air Fund."

Mrs. G. C. B., Addison, N. Y., sends $3 for one boy's outing.

"A friend of children requested me to enclose to you $3 toward the fresh air fund at Mont-Lawn," writes Josephine H., Amawalk, N. Y.

"How far is Mont-Lawn from Nyack?" asks Mrs. E. G. L., of Portchester, in forwarding her gift ($6). It is a twenty minute wagon ride from the Nyack R.R. Depot, and if the writer will give us the pleasure of a visit and will send word to the Housemother, Miss Collins, she will be met at the depot.

L. W. O., Dorchester, Mass., sends $6, "to send two little children to Mont-Lawn this summer."

Mrs. G. E. G., Memphis, Mich., sends $1, "from Roy Thomas, a little boy's saving bank. He died last winter. His mother wished to have it sent to aid the Mont-Lawn waifs." Surely a consecrated offering put to a beautiful use—the gift of a dear dead child to the little tenement waifs.

Here is another touching little memorial gift to the Fresh Air work. Mrs. M. M., Stevensville, Mont., writes: "Enclosed find the sum of $1 for the Children's Home at Nyack, N. Y., in memory of our dear little Archie, who departed this life on December 22, 1902, at the tender age of eight years. The money was his own earnings, and he was planning to send it this summer to the Children's Home. He loved THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I feel that I shall always take your good paper in memory of our dear little boy as long as I live."

"I wish you to use check for $6 for the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn." writes E. M. D., Siegfried, Pa.

"Kindly use the amount in the enclosed check ($3) to send a child to Mont-Lawn." writes Maude E. S., Brooklyn, N.Y.

W. R. O. and Family, St. Johns, Mich., send $3. One dollar each, from Mr. W. R. O., Mrs. W. R. O., Master Glen W. O. They send with it this earnest prayer: "May God's choicest blessings follow the same."

All contributions to our Fresh Air Fund will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE PRESIDENT'S FRIEND OF THE MAINE WOODS

THERE is a man, away up in the northeast corner of the United States who, not long ago, was one of the guests of honor at the White House. He spent several days in Washington, and departed laden with souvenirs of his visit, in the shape of gifts from the President and his family. "Bill" Sewell, indeed received a hearty welcome, and with good reason, for he has been one of Mr. Roosevelt's instructors in the lore of the forest. Many a night has the latter spent in Sewell's camp in the heart of the Maine woods. Sewell taught him the habits of the deer and the elk, and the two have followed their trails mile after mile together.

The veteran hunter lives in a part of the country which is almost on the edge of civilization, although Island Falls is quite a respectable-sized town, having a little over a thousand people. During much of the year Sewell spends his time at his camp, on the shore of Lake Mattawamkeag. Beside this body of water the President has spent many a day forgetting the rest of the world. Perhaps the tales their father has related of his experiences with the various creatures of the woods inspired the Roosevelt boys with the desire to camp out with "Bill," for this year Theodore, junior, and Kermit, will probably spend part of their vacation at the camp.

SEWELL, THE HUNTER (PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S GUIDE), AND THE CAMP IN THE MAINE WOODS

A rough-and-ready kind of place is Camp Sewell; it was not built for looks, but for use. When unoccupied, the windows and doors are closed by heavy shutters, which are securely fastened to protect it from out-side depredators. One portion below is divided into a kitchen, with an outfit of dishes, kettles and pans. Above are the sleeping apartments, containing cots enough for a half dozen or more. The front of the house is used as a store-room and sitting-room, and, during the summer, it is generally littered with rifles and shot-guns, fishing rods, hunting boots, coats, ammunition, belts, knives and other equipment. At Island Falls, is the home of the Sewell family, a generously-proportioned New England farm-house. "Bill" Sewell is a typical "Down-Easter." Although well on in years he is still hale and vigorous, with a keen eye and abundant muscle. In short, he is the kind of a man who appeals to the President, and a warm friendship exists between them, as is shown by the willingness of Mr. Roosevelt to entrust his sons to the care of the Maine backwoodsman and hunter.

Choosing the Boy's Lot in Life

WHEN the children are little, playing about the doors, going to school, running errands, doing as they are told, the parents may seem to have their hardest times, but in reality ese are the easiest. A much more difficult place on h s road is reached when there is need and occasion settle with some degree of positiveness on the boy's, othe girl's, lot in life. The boy's whole future of suc- s or failure may hang upon the decision made for n by his father and mother, or made by him with ir consent, when he is somewhere between fifteen and hteen.

Shall John go to college or to business, is a vital estion, bristling with points of interest, and many a n ponders it in wakeful hours, and fears he may ake a mistake, and is disturbed when he encounters opposite opinions of neighbors and friends. Going wntown on the street car, an acquaintance casually s, "That's a fine boy of yours, Mr. A. What are going to do with him after he ishes in the high school?" If the oly is, "I am thinking of sending n to college," in nine cases out ten the other answers, doubtly, "You are? Well, if he wants go, perhaps it's all right, but think the four years lost from busiss!" The next man consulted es a different view, and declares nly that the best and most liberal ucation a man can get is not too od for a business career; that it indeed, as decided an advantage business as in a profession, for a y to have attended college and ceived a diploma.

A good deal should be left to the y himself in a matter of this nd. To force a reluctant lad into academic groove for which he s no desire, is usually a stupid under, as the boy will simply unrrate his privileges and waste his ne. But if a boy, loving books, ving study, and prizing what a llege has to offer, longs to go, ery opportunity should be afrded him. In the long run, the ars will not be lost. Business ors are opening more and more idely to college men. They are anted in the counting room, in the ilroad office, in the broker's office, the bank. It goes without sayg that they are welcome in the ewspaper world, and that wherever a trained intelligence and a ch vocabulary count for much, e college discipline will help em on. The greater maturity ained by the four years in college a good offset to the knowledge cquired in an equal time by the oy who enters business direct om school.

Of course, as a preliminary requisite to professional udy—legal, medical, theological, or scientific—college aining is almost indispensable. Parents who can fford, even at the cost of much effort and self-denial, o send their sons to college, may be assured that they re freeing them in the future from certain handicaps nd giving them a richer preparation for life than they ould otherwise have.

Still, there is culture without college. A boy who nows that his parents need his aid in their hampered nd limited means, who has possibly a widowed mother, r brothers and sisters who are yet to be educated, hould think twice before he lets the home people cramp hemselves to help him on. Business is itself an educaion, libraries abound, and nothing can permanently rush a bright boy, who means to get on. In a majority f cases, John must decide the question for himself. It oncerns his future, and is important first of all to him.

Fathers should hesitate in being arbitrary or autoratic in setting the life work of sons. The merchant aturally wants his boy to carry on his business, but the oy may hark back to some artistic ancestor, and have ot an atom of the commercial instinct in his veins. If his be the case, the God-given endowment should not e folded away like the talent in the parable, but should e put to serious use. Another boy may fit into the niche the father prizes so highly. Care should be taken that decisions are not made too early in life. At occasional very youthful periods a boy's ambition crystallizes around points which will present no allurement when he is older.

It is all-important, in view of the fast-approaching hour when the boy of ten or twelve will be the youth of eighteen or twenty, that the foundation work, the work in grammar departments and thenceforward in high-school lines, shall be thoroughly done. Parents should co-operate with teachers in holding children to rigid accuracy and strict account in these days of early training, for they tell on the whole career of the future.

The Selfish Choice

He that saveth his life shall lose it. This is eternally true. One never makes a purely selfish choice, mindful alone of one's own advancement, of one's own desires, of one's own well-being, that he or she does not live to regret it. The birthright is sold for the mess of pottage. It is never to be regained, and the very memory of the savory pottage is as dust and ashes in the mouth.

THE SINGING LESSON

"Do, re, mi, fa, sol—sing right out, I say.
Bless your hearts, my children, this work isn't play."

IN COMMON DAYS

IN days supreme of dear delight.
When happy thoughts within us dwell,
Like vestals robed in stainless white,
Who time their footsteps by the swell
Of sweet-toned bells upon the air,
Then have we least the need for prayer.

In days obscured by veiling folds
Of grief, or clouded o'er with dread,
While dumb suspense relentless holds
Its sword above the shrinking head;
Then, even in the soul's despair,
Is not the deepest need of prayer.

Since to the dead Gethsemane
The pitying angels, soon or late,
Shall come with tenderest ministry,
Since each birthe day is but the gate
To some rich temple builded fair,
That heavenward builds a golden stair.

God keep us through the common days,
The level stretches white with dust,
When thought is tired, and hands upraise
Their burdens feebly, since they must.
In days of slowly fretting care,
Then most we need the strength of prayer.

Afternoon Picnics

AN all day picnic after one is grown is apt to be a rather fatiguing affair. The busy lady of the house, who cannot often spare a whole day from her affairs, finds it one of the easiest things in the world to get up a little affair over-breakfast dishes time, or late morning progress based just long enough to take a generous luncheon basket and hamper, and make an expedition of it to some shady spot. An afternoon picnic is a much simpler matter and may be managed nicely on occasions one lives at home in town or country. City people have parks and other places of resort within easy reach, and those who live in the midst of rural residence have groves and fields and meadows to choose from where they may for a summer afternoon break from the routine and the cares of the world and be their boys and girls.

Select a place as near home as possible within a half hour or an hour of home. This minimizes the journey and the fatigue involved in reaching the chosen point. Wear old clothes. An easy fitting shirt waist, a short skirt and comfortable shoes will make your outing delightful when best clothes would render it a torment. Let the children wear things which they need not even think about the girls their simplest frocks and sailor hats, the boys their strongest trousers and least respectable jackets. To be obliged to look out best clothes to worn or stained when one is on a picnic is a bore and a burden. Manage to have papa join the family party at the picnic supper. This will remove any uncomfortable pack of responsibility as to the propriety of leaving him alone through the early evening.

The picnic basket should be well furnished with sandwiches. Provide for extraordinary appetites. Fresh air arouses healthy hunger, and a fussy tastes partly satisfied when eaten in an unaccustomed place. Mince the ham or veal, or chicken when a very spreadable with very little added bread and butter, or make cheese the filling, or lettuce with a mayonnaise dressing, or jam, or peanut paste, or anchovy, or chopped raisins and nuts.

It is a good plan to have several kinds of sandwiches, and plain bread and butter is often eaten with relish. Cake—molasses, sponge, fruit, or cup—comes in very opportunely as dessert, and you need a bottle or two of cold milk, and a bottle of iced tea or coffee. Avoid messy things. Avoid things which require unpacking of dishes. Keep thin wooden spoons and paper napkins and tin spoons for your afternoon picnics, and you will not have on your mind the care of dainty china, fine linen, and costly silver.

The busy mother who cannot often indulge in a long sweet of a summer holiday will be greatly refreshed if frequently she treats herself to three or four afternoon hours at some nearby place for a summer picnic.

In Convalescence

What gladness there is in the household when the sick, who have been as we say, at death's door are on the high road to recovery. A quiet, often dull, dread spectre, and succeed with the shadows. Life is sometimes over thee. The whole atmosphere changes. Mother is better, Father is getting well. Sister, who was despaired of last week, will soon be sitting up. Oh the joy of returning health. Yet let the convalescent tread softly, for these first faltering steps are full of peril still, and a relapse may be dangerous renewed. And let nurses and doctors be vigilant and, and above everything, guard the patient from too many visitors. A sick room must never be a reception room for callers. Everyone is not discreet. Even dear friends should wait a little until their presence can do no possible harm, but only good to the one who is climbing back to health again.

The Only King by Divine Right ❋ Israel Asking for a King

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 5
I. SAMUEL 8: 1-10

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT: PREPARE YOUR HEARTS UNTO THE LORD AND SERVE HIM ONLY—I. SAM. 7: 3.

CAN a good man have bad sons? It was so in the case of Samuel. His sons Joel and Abiah were so bad that the seventy elders of Israel, the Sanhedrin, came to him with a remonstrance when he made these bad sons judges over Israel. The charge was, "Thy sons walk not in thy ways." Samuel himself was so upright that he could say, "Here I am, witness against me before the Lord and before his anointed. Whose ox have I taken, or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whom have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it to you." And the people answered, "Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." But not such were his sons. They had taken bribes and perverted judgment. So notoriously bad were they that the elders requested that the judgeship should be abolished as the most effectual way to get rid of them.

How can we account for Samuel's sons? We certainly must conclude that Samuel was a good man, but perhaps not a faithful father. There is more reason, presumably, to believe that his wife was not a good mother. It is not to her credit that we are not told who she was. Dr. Joseph Parker says of such men as Samuel: "They may be more fitted for public teaching and public stimulus than for private utterance of truth and domestic control of life." Samuel certainly should have been forewarned by the example of Eli, "whose sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not." He should have remembered that his first commission from God was to bear a condemnatory message to Eli in regard to his neglect of right home training.

What did the elders propose to Samuel should take the place of the judgeship? They proposed that authority should all be centered in one man, a king. The bad character of Samuel's sons gave them an excuse for this request. Their desire for a king had another root, "to be like all the nations." Other nations about them had kings, who were leaders in battle, and most picturesque figureheads in their royal apparel. Perhaps the elders of Israel had been goaded to make a request for a king by the taunts of the people of other nations. God, as their invisible king, had brought them greater deliverances than the kings of other nations, but the spectacular element was lacking. They wanted to see the grandeur and pomp of a visible king. As their fathers put a golden calf in place of the unseen God, they now proposed to have a visible king in place of the divine, invisible king. They would have said it was only to represent God, but they were displacing God.

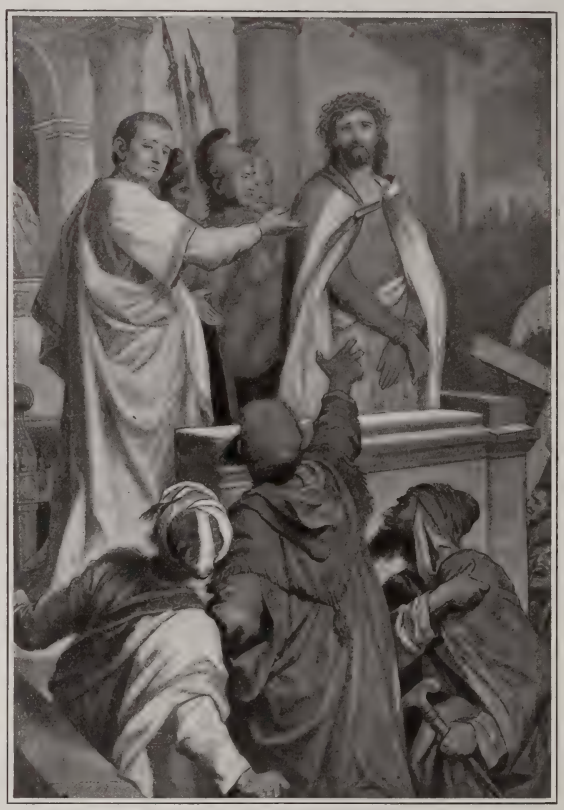
The nobleness of Samuel's character is shown in the way he received the request of the elders. He was more concerned about how God was dishonored than about the rebuke given to himself. And Samuel set the whole matter before the Lord in prayer. He talked face to face with God about it, and God told him what to say to the people. First, he was to remind them how they had been guarded and guided, as no earthly king could have guarded or guided them, since they had been delivered from their bondage in Egypt. God also told Samuel to tell the people how they would be disappointed in a man-king, who would, in his selfishness, demand that their sons and daughters should be his servants, and that they should also give him a part of their living, the fruits and grains which they raised in their gardens and their fields, and that he would levy upon their sheep and asses, and take them for his own use. But when Samuel presented matters as God had told them to do, the elders were not convinced. Their only answer, echoed by the people, was, "Nay, but we will have a king over us, that we may also be like all the nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles." After all, it was not justice but display that was wanted. God well knew what was in their hearts when he said to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them." And yet God said to Samuel, "Hearken unto their voice," that is, give them a king, for to give them what they wanted was God's wise way of letting them learn the folly of their own way and the wisdom of the divine way.

Illustration and Application

A fitting lesson this for the nearest Sabbath to Independence Day, which recalls that Fourth of July when the people of America, in behalf of all peoples, declared that the time had come when kings should be put away wherever nations had manhood enough for self-government under the invisible Kingship of God. That act was the consummate flower of Samuel's teaching that God alone is King by divine right; the flower also of that most distinctive doctrine of Christ, the sacred individuality of every human soul as a son or daughter of God; a brother or sister of Christ, for whom he died; a brother or sister of every human being, to be loved and helped, not hated or harmed; a brother or sister of the King, therefore, sharing his right to rule.

The lesson of to-day describes not an advance from monarchy to popular government under God, but a retreat from a divine popular government to a monarchy that dishonored both God and the nation. Let us consider how this backward movement was produced by the sins (1) of Samuel, (2) of his sons, (3) of the people.

I. THE SIN OF SAMUEL. He made his sons judges. This he had no right to do. Samuel was a good man on the whole, but unquestionably sinned in this act, which dishonored God to honor his sons. God, as the nation's King, had appointed him supreme judge and premier, but God had not made the Samuel household a royal family. Samuel having been appointed for worth, not birth, took the place of God as king and appointed his sons on the ground of birth, not worth, which amounted to constituting a royal family. It is clear he did not even consult God. No man can be "king by Divine right" whose character is wrong, for sin is rebellion against "Divine right." And no man can be a "justice" or judge who judges unjustly, except in defiance of God. How could so great and good a man as Samuel fall into such a wrong? He must have been led to it by the earlier wrong of excessive fondness as a father. In his family government, first of all, he had allowed his heart to dethrone his head, his affections to dominate his judgment. His undue kindness to his sons, as usual in such cases, proved the greatest unkindness. He whose first great mission from God had been to warn his predecessor, Eli, of God's judgments impending because his sons "made themselves vile and he restrained them not," was now repeating Eli's sin of wicked softness, and was soon to see his household, in consequence, dishonored as Eli's household had been. In home and State alike "too much mercy is want of mercy and spoils more life." But Samuel's sin of letting his heart dethrone his head goes back yet further. The fact that his wife's name is unmentioned, suggests that he probably allowed affection to set aside judgment when he chose a mother for his boys. As husband and as father he "loved not wisely but too well," Even in a house where there is a too fond father, a faithful mother, in whose family government mercy seasons justice but does not swamp it, usually can save the day. But it is the father's duty to be the ruler, under God, of the home. Samuel would have been really kinder if he had given his boys the rod of correction instead of the rod of authority. It was nepotism at its worst.



"BEHOLD YOUR KING!"

Several morals stand out clearly from this sin of Samuel. The first is, that in every age we need to pray that we may be saved from following the mistakes of great men, aye, of good men. There is scarcely a bad cause, as Shakespeare reminds us, but some preacher or "Christian statesman" will "bless it with a text."

Israel's very courts, the last resort of the oppressed, were debauched with bribery, not alone because the judges were wicked, but primarily because a good man appointed these bad men through personal friendship, regardless of the public good. Such cases did not end with Samuel. Another moral from Samuel's sin, is that we should never carry out a plan we dare not talk over with God. In the words of Henry Coleridge:

If for any wish thou dar'st not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

But the chief lesson for the Sunday School, for adult and children's classes alike, is that those parents only are really kind who restrain in their children every evil tendency, and, when they are wicked, punish rather th reward them; who, in any case, refuse to p on them any honor they have not earned, to set them in a larger place than they can fi where they can only rattle about in conspic ous display of their incompetence. It is tr kind, in accord with Christ's parable, to pla them where they will be called to go up hig er, rather than as Samuel did, put them in t highest room from which they must erelon be turned out, with no chance to go any wa but down.

II. THE SINS OF SAMUEL'S SONS. "H sons turned aside after lucre, and took bribe and perverted judgment" For these sin Samuel's sons were themselves responsibl We have spoken of the father's fault of ove fondness; but when the sons came to years understanding, and wilfully went wrong, the had no right to lay it on heredity or trainin They were far better off in heredity, born such a noble father, than most others. Eve when the heredity is bad, it need not dominat Heredity, environment, character, the grea est of these is character. A cartoonist pic tures heredity as a spirited horse, disposed t run away; with the pertinent motto, "Here ity pulls, but you must drive." Oftener, me who go wrong, lay it on parental trainin Such men, almost never say their parent were too indulgent. It is because father wa "too strict," they say, about church going an Sabbath keeping, that they make the Lord Day a devil's day. Such excuses are not onl false, but mean. It is a case of those wh claim to be men, pleading the "baby act," a if they couldn't help going wrong. Let ther learn of the child we recently quoted, wh discovered she had a will, and that it wa made to be her inside king. Whenever w are doing anything weak or wrong, we can sa to ourselves, "stop that, and make me min me." The names of Samuel's sons, show tha they were in childhood prayerfully dedicate to God. The name of one was Joel, meaning Jehovah is God; and of the other, Abiah meaning, Jehovah, his father. But both mad money their god. Their father's sin was un due fondness for them; but theirs was undu fondness for money. This led on to bribery which is nothing more or less than treason i its meanest form. Benedict Arnold is exe crated because he bargained to sell an Ameri can fort to the British, in the Revolution. It i a more fundamental treason to buy or sel justice in a court or cabinet, or to buy an sell laws; and yet worse to buy or sell ballots the very foundation of popular government It has recently been shown that there is a amazing lack of conscience among a consid erable percentage of the voters, who call thei treason, being "paid for their time." Th Methodist Conference in Delaware, made a ringing declaration against this sin and crime which is needed by many in every State. An the worst bribery of all is that which dis guises itself. But let not those who are wholly free from bribery, forget that they are not whol ly free from the fundamental sin that led Joel and Abiah into bribery—the love of money which is the root of all kinds of evil. As prairie grass is best displaced by planting blue grass; so an undue love of money is best dis placed by an increasing love for God and man

III. THE SIN OF THE PEOPLE. They have rejected me, that I should not reign over them The undue fondness of Samuel for his sons and of his sons for money, finds its counter part in the corresponding sin of the people, an undue fondness for pomp. They desired to be "like all the nations," with their royal processions, and the other playthings with which grown up children are amused by royal nurses. Israel had hitherto had no King but God. To set up a visible king was a sin similar to setting up the golden calf. It was pretended the calf was not to take the place of God, but to be a helpful symbol of God; but in reality images always shut out the invisible God. Theoretically visible kings always reign as representatives of God, but they usually misrepresent him and make men forget that God is King. "The king can do no wrong," sets up a new and false standard of right.

But once God put his Kingship in visible form—in Christ, whose very name means the anointed King—he is the only King, the only Priest, and all who bear either title are standing in his light. Men crowned him with thorns in mockery, and Pilate said in derision to the people, "Behold your King," but he is really making all the kingdoms of this world "Christendom," that is, Christ's kingdom. The beginning of everything good in government is the crowning of Christ in individual hearts, but the time has come, in the multiplication of Christians for individual convictions, the seed of the Gospel, to grow into Christian social institutions, the full-grown Gospel of the fourth of Luke.

Horrors of China's Famine

MORE AID SENT TO CONSUL-GENERAL McWADE — THE SELLING OF CHILDREN CONFIRMED

LATE cablegrams from Hongkong describe the condition of the famine-stricken natives of Kwang-Si province as growing steadily rse. Governor Wong, the governor of province, estimates that over 1,000,000 ives are starving in the territory under jurisdiction. The distress in certain tricts is most acute. Children and wo- n are freely offered for sale. The rice vest promises well, but it will not be ilable for from four to six weeks. Ex- sive relief operations will be difficult hout foreign supervision, which will be d to obtain in Kwang-Si. Assistance s been sent from Hongkong and Can- , but the funds available are becoming austed. The population of Kwang-Si rgely agricultural.

United States Consul-General McWade, Canton, lately made another appeal, ough the State Department, in behalf American aid for the Kwang-Si sufferers. In that appeal he said that the starving peasants were selling their children for ad. He wrote:

Reliable information from American missaries and native sources having come to from Kwai Ping, Wuchow, and other ces in Kwang-Si, that the destitution and sequent suffering in certain parts of that vince were appalling, and that, in their perate condition, the heads of families e selling their children and women for m $2 each to $5 each, I sent you the fore- g despatch. Frequent appeals have been de to me for help, and I am frank to say, so rtrending were they, that I have contrib- d far beyond my means. I would give re if I had it.

The Consul-General also forwarded letrs from several American missionaries ncerning the reports of frightful suffer- g. "Boys, girls and women," one mis- onary wrote, "are sold for $2, $3, $5, and $10, and so many are offered that rchasers are difficult to find." At sev- al points, relief stations have been open- by the missionaries, and the hungry are ing fed, as many as 3,000 being helped ily in some localities. The daily death te is steadily increasing. All that the ssionaries can do is being done, but unled, they will be powerless to afford lief, except in a few localities.

In a letter to Hon. Francis B. Loomis, ssistant Secretary of State, Washing- n, dated April 22, Consul-General Mcade relates the experience of Rev. aac L. Hesse, missionary in the famine- icken district of Kwai-Ping, 150 miles st of Wuchow. Mr. McWade writes:

Thousands of peasants, Mr. Hesse reorted, were dying of starvation and very ny thousands of men, women and children d been sold to slavery, the females to lives prostitution and the males sold for employent in the Straits' Settlements and elsehere. He handed me the enclosed typeritten statement of typical scenes which me under his observation. I again made a ge contribution for the purchase of rice, which he thanked me heartily, telling me the same time, of the appreciation in ich he and his fellow-missionaries held me and my efforts to help them. I strongly advised Mr. Hesse to place the situation before Governor Blake and the Bishop of Victoria. He thanked me for my advice and promptly acted upon it. As a result, H. E. Sir Henry A. Blake, Governor of Hongkong, has formally called a public meeting. At a meeting of the Legislative Council, H. E. Blake stated that he had investigated the reports of the great distress in the province of Kwang Si, and had ascertained that they were correct and that the famine was very pitiable.

The memorandum of Mr. Hesse, referred to by Consul-General McWade recites some heartrending scenes in the famine districts of Kwang-Si Province. Men fell over and died while waiting for their turn to receive meal tickets. Babies, mere skeletons, were left by the wayside, by their starving mothers, who could not bear to see them suffer. Mothers sell their children in order to get rice. Many innocents are sold into a life of shame. On one of the launches mother and daughter met incidentally after being sold and separated for three weeks. They flew into each others embrace and wept for joy, but this was soon changed into tears of sorrow, because the man who had bought the girl tore her away from her mother's arms. Men who have no food for their families come to the missionaries and plead that they would take their grown sons as servants without wages only to give them food.

The famine is increasing, and until the gathering of the rice crop in August the people can do nothing for themselves. All contributions are turned into rice and given regularly to the starving by the missionaries, so that no doubt can be entertained of charity reaching deserving objects. Consul-General McWade will gladly forward all contributions to the missionaries, who will, later on, present a detailed account of their expenditure.

Sometime ago the proprietor of this journal forwarded by cable to Consul-General McWade, through the State Department, $5,000 to be applied to the relief work. Last week a second remittance of $10,000 was cabled the Consul-General for the same purpose. Receipt of this second contribution from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was acknowledged by Hon. Francis B. Loomis, Assistant Secretary of State, June 6. On June 9, Third Assistant Secretary H. H. D. Pierce, of the State Department, wrote from Washington, enclosing a copy of the following cablegram sent by Consul-General McWade:

"CANTON, June 7.

"Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.:

"Viceroy Tesou asks me to transmit through you to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD his profound and heartfelt gratitude for the donation of Ten Thousand Dollars to starving Kwang-Si. It was urgently needed. He says it is an added proof of America's friendship and sympathy for China. I am vigorously preparing a second American relief expedition.

(Signed) McWADE."

A Good Woman's Protest

ROM a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader in Walla Walla, Wash., comes this letter, hich will awaken a sympathetic interest in e hearts of wives and mothers everywhere:

Dear Editor:—Our morning paper lately conned an invitation from a saloon keeper (who has t completed, in the most expensive style, and th all the magnificence of an Oriental court, a dern drinking palace), to the ladies of Walla alla, to come with escorts to view its splendors. wished, no doubt, to show to them what an ticing place he had prepared to lure their husnds, sons and sweethearts from the enjoyments the home fireside. When my husband read it to , all the indignation within me was aroused. I ote a protest, but the daily paper to which I sented it, decided that it would not do for them publish—it would hurt their business. "Then,' aid, "the saloon controls you." "Yes," they anered, "the saloon controls all newspapers; adding t the church people themselves, and Christians a body, would not uphold them in any uprooting evil in the communities in which they lived, d that the ministers, even, would not uphold m.

E. A. B.

It would be difficult, indeed, for any one to d fault with the self-respecting women of alla Walla, or of any other civilized comunity, for protesting against such an invi- tion, which is an insult to all womanhood. her protest, the writer of the letter characterizes the rum traffic as "a tearer down of homes, an underminer of high principles, a spoiler of men and youth and of all nobility," and the saloon keeper as "a human spider, who has woven his web that he might draw you into it; he has decked it with all bright colors and beautiful things. He has invited you—mothers, wives and daughters—to come, and by your presence approve all that he is doing to stamp out God's likeness in men. No drunkard shall ever inherit the kingdom of heaven. Where, then, shall be the palace of the drunkard maker? The lowest depth of the caldron of hell is not too deep for him. . . . . Sister-women! Go not to this powerhouse of Satan. Think what a mighty blow against purity, against your sons and daughters, against the Master of Life, would be your presence in that gilded palace of sin and immorality. Christ be with us to be the impregnable corner-stone to home building for God and for heaven."

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM CXLVII
Psalm of Power

1. Praise ye the Lord: for it is good to sing praises unto our God. 2. The Lord doth build up Jerusalem: he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.

"HE BINDETH UP THEIR WOUNDS"

3. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds.
4. He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.
5. Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite.

It is much harder to heal a broken heart than to make a Milky Way. Stars can shine and swing, but they cannot love, nor laugh, nor sing as mortals do. Creative power is great. The power of the Cross is greater. Saturn and the sun are small by the side of saints made out of sinners, who will live while God lives and live with Him too, and live like Him. He who calls all stars by name will not let the individual be lost in the multitude of the saved. Don't worry, Christian. The God Father will love all his own, even as the human father knows and loves each child.

PSALM CXLVIII
Creator's Praise Psalm

1. Praise ye the Lord. 2. Praise ye him, all his angels: praise ye him, all his hosts. 3. Praise ye him, sun and moon: praise him, all ye stars of light.

"ALL HIS HOSTS"

4. Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens.
7. Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps:
8. Fire and hail; snow and vapor; stormy wind fulfilling his word:
9. Mountains, and all hills; fruitful trees, and all cedars:
10. Beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl:
11. Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth:
12. Both young men, and maidens; old men, and children: 13. Let them praise the name of the Lord.

Only inspiration could call such a chorus choir together, and write both harmony and melody so no discords appear. Sin has so often dulled the ear that many men hear none of the silent songs sung by the animate and inanimate together. But the singing goes on. If men hold their tongues, mountains will not. If the children had not cried, "Hosannah!" the rocks and stones would have done so. Oh! for celestial hearing of the oratorio that children of Grace can sing, accompanied by the full orchestra of Nature.

PSALM CXLIX
Psalm of Praise

1. Praise ye the Lord. Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints.

"WITH THE TIMBREL AND HARP"

2. Let Israel rejoice in him that made him; let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.
3. Let them praise his name in the dance: let them sing praises unto him with the timbrel and harp.
4. For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people.

Neither a psalm, nor a song, nor a life that is all prayer can be acceptable to God. There must be praise. It may not be set to music, or even spoken aloud by the lip; but the silent voices of the soul will sing unto Him, and He will hear and know, even if angels and men do not. Many a gift to the cause of Christ and his church is but praise in that form. How beautifully verses three and four paint the scene of Christ at the wedding feast of Cana of Galilee.

PSALM CL
Musician's Psalm

1. Praise ye the Lord. 3. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet; praise him with the psaltery and harp.

"UPON THE LOUD CYMBALS"

4. Praise him with the timbrel and dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs.
5. Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high sounding cymbals.
6. Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.

The world is growing better, much better. This twentieth century is hearing the voice of praise to God from more lips and more instruments than ever, in all the history of the world. Art, machinery, commerce, press, night, day, pulpit, pew, politician, people, and all their productions, are consciously or unconsciously turning into musicians and tuning their all to the glory of Him who made Christmas and Easter—who is making us like Himself, and at the same time is making a place for us! Let us meet there—in heaven.

The Safeguard of a Nation*

How American Influence has Increased and How it may be Maintained

OUR position among the nations of the world at the present time is eminently gratifying to the patriotic mind. Time was, and that within the memory of men still living, when the United States were not considered at all in the counsels of European cabinets. We were regarded as isolated, as being so self-centred and so indifferent to the world's affairs, that all consideration of American opinion and American principles might safely be left out of the questions of international policy. There has been a gradual change in this matter during the past half century, and a conspicuous proof of the fact was given when the Boxer troubles in China recently brought the civilized nations around a common council board. It was then found that the United States had become an important factor in international arrangements and was a power whose friendship was worth having. It has been almost amusing of late to see how strenuously our good will has been sought by England, Germany and Russia, and how effusive these nations have been in conciliating our government.

What use can we, as a nation, make of the influential position thus attained? The responsibility laid upon us is grave and momentous. It is not that we propose to meddle in the disputes of other nations, nor to become parties to the alliances which group the nations in separate camps; but it is within our power to exert an influence upon cabinets and policies, all the stronger because of our holding aloof from their quarrels. This influence will increase, and become permanent if it is uniformly exerted on the side of righteousness. The old fashioned word has not in past history counted for much in international policy. The question of might has been the sole question considered. The nation with the strongest army could enforce its will, and could annex a province, or absorb a neighbor, without any consideration of right or justice. But we appear to be entering a new era when the eternal principles of rectitude will be recognized. This is our opportunity. If it is known throughout the world that in any dispute involving those principles this country will always be found on the side of truth and right, our nation will be exalted to a position of power and influence never yet attained by any nation.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

L. A. B., Mansfield, Conn. Can you tell me the author of "He leadeth me"? Commencing in pastures green? Not always, sometimes, "He Who knoweth best, in kindness leadeth me in weary ways, where heavy shadows be."

Perhaps some reader can give the desired information.

Repentant, Cincinnati, O. Is it possible to get relief from remorse? I did something in a period of temptation which can never be undone. One and perhaps two, both of whom I love dearly, must suffer heart-break, when the disclosure is made, as some day it must be. I am ready and willing to suffer myself, but to see either or both of them suffer through my misconduct, will drive me distracted.

That is the sad penalty of sin. Even when God forgives it, the inevitable consequences cannot be avoided. Still, you must remember that the punishment is not the same as if there had been no repentance. The father who must punish his child, does not administer the same punishment to the child who has repented, as to the one who is obstinate or indifferent. We can imagine that God may in his providence bring alleviation, in some way, to one who feels so acutely as you do, of the suffering you apprehend. Remorse is useless, and should not be cherished. Submission is the attitude you should cultivate. You must bear the cross which your own hands have fashioned, but even in the sorrowful way your steps will be helped by Him who has borne your sin and through whom you are forgiven.

Inquirer, Bridgeport, Conn. If you can get to church in time, and with reasonable convenience, in no other way, you are right to use any means of transportation at hand. In all such cases, we ought to avoid, wherever possible, giving others occasion to labor on the sabbath.

Subscriber, Seattle, Wash. Is it right to address Christ directly in public prayer? Ought one not rather to pray to God asking the things we need for Christ's sake?

The mystery of the Trinity cannot be grasped in all its fulness by the human mind. It is impossible to keep the idea of God the Father and God the Son wholly distinct in the mind when we commune with the Deity. Nor is it necessary. Christ said (John 14:14), "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." We may, therefore, ask him to fulfil his promise.

Ida May C., Spring City, Pa. Is the Hebrew language still in use. If so, where is it spoken? If not, when did it cease to be used?

We do not think it is in common use anywhere at the present time. It is an ecclesiastical language, used in the synagogues by the Jews. The law and the Prophets and the Psalms are read in Hebrew, but only the educated Jews understand it. The uneducated Jews use Yiddish, which is a modernized corrupt form of Hebrew. Even in the time of our Lord, the common speech of the people was Aramaic. The natural inference from Nehemiah 8:8 is that the exiles who returned from Babylon were not thoroughly familiar with the language. The men appointed to read the Scriptures were obliged "to give the sense," in order that the hearers might understand what was read to them.

Mrs. E. H. M., Orillia, Canada. Some time ago I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that there was some part of the United States offered the Finns to settle in; since that I have not been able to find it. Would you kindly let me know where it is? I also heard there was somewhere offered for Canadians to settle in, where land is cheap.

Many Finns have settled in Wisconsin, Michigan and Minnesota, and a number have tried the experiment of locating in Florida. There was some talk of Alaska as a possible choice for Finnish settlers. For information on the whole subject, write to Dr. Sorsen, Calumet, Mich.

S. E. W. Is it true that a member of the British Parliament is not allowed to resign?

Yes, once elected, he must serve until the Parliament is dissolved by the king or until it expires by natural course, which it does in seven years from the time of its election. But ingenuity has found a way to evade the law through another law, which provides that any member of Parliament accepting an office in the gift of the king, thereby vacates his seat, and cannot occupy it unless re-elected by his constituents. When a member wishes to vacate his seat, he accepts the office of the Wardenship of the Chiltern Hundreds, a mythical office, having no duties and a salary of only five dollars a year, and as he does not present himself for re-election, he is out of Parliament.

Curious, Tarrytown, N. Y. Is there any explanation of the curious figures on the common willow-patterned china?

The landscape and figures relate to a Chinese legend. On the right is a substantial house; on the left a commoner house, near the centre, a bridge, on which are three figures, above, on the left, an island and a boat and two birds, supposed to be turtle doves. The legend is, that a gardener, living in the small house, loved the daughter of a mandarin who lived in the mansion on the right. The mandarin refused to permit them to marry. They decided to elope, and the three figures on the bridge are those of the girl and her lover (who carries her jewel case), followed by the mandarin with a whip. They succeed in making their escape, and lived on the island pictured on the upper part of the combination; but were discovered and killed, and were transformed by the Chinese deities into the two turtle doves.

R. A. F., Newport, R.I. Does not the word "magnitude" used by astronomers in reference to stars, mean their size? I was contradicted lately when I said so.

No, the word refers to their brightness. The ancient astronomers classified the stars according to their lustre in six groups. The brightest and most conspicuous they called stars of the first magnitude; those next in order of the second magnitude, and so on. It is possible that at that time they assumed that the most conspicuous stars were the largest, but now the element of distance is taken into account.

Student, Passaic, N. J. What is the most powerful microscope known?

It is understood that the most perfect instrument is the new German microscope now in use at Jena University. United States Consul Monaghan, at Chemnitz, reports that it is now used by Professors Siedentopf and Zsigmondy, and that "they have seemingly accomplished what the great Helmholz did not conceive as possible. This physicist declared the limit of microscopic perception to be 0.0001 millimeter (0.000003937 inch), while it is estimated that this limit has been extended to from 0.000004 to 0.000007 millimeter. Such an achievement promises great things in scientific investigation." A description of the instrument appears in the Consular reports of our State Department.

Replying to an inquiry by a reader of this paper, the Scientific American, of New York City, to which the inquiry was referred, sends the following:

Whatever advantage in steam pressure a locomotive would derive at a high altitude from the reduced pressure of the air, would be met by the reduction of the quantity of oxygen in the air. If back pressure is reduced by the former cause, the amount of air needed to consume a certain weight of coal would be increased by the latter. We have no data of actual runs at hand, but should not expect any great difference between sea level and the altitudes attained by ordinary roads.

R. S. E., Germantown, Pa. I am the victim of an evil habit. I have struggled against it, have tried in all ways to give it up, have committed my case to God, but nothing enables me to conquer. What must I do?

You do not say what the habit is, therefore, we can speak only in general terms. Where there is strong faith, it is sufficient to put the whole matter in God's hands, and power is granted to overcome. But, you must remember that God's usual course is not to relieve you by an act of his power of the trouble; though he does so in some cases. Generally, however, he requires the person to work with him for deliverance. You may be quite sure that victory is certain if you do this. You should study your case, find out what thoughts, persons, books, pictures or places lead to the onslaught of temptation, and should avoid them. Then, when the conflict comes, you should hold fast to the conviction that the divine strength is sufficient to give you the victory. With that conviction in your heart, if you are sincere in your desire to be delivered, you will succeed.

Inquirer, New York City. I have seen on a coin from the Isle of Man, and also on a document, a curious combination of three legs, which I am told is the escutcheon of the island. Can you tell me the meaning of it?

Several explanations are given, but the most plausible is that relating to its conquest by Great Britain. It is said that when it was originally conquered by Harold, the Norwegian King, in 870 its coat of arms consisted of a ship with three masts, the sails close furled. It was again conquered by Alexander, King of Scotland, in 1265, and later, in 1400, fell under the arms of Henry IV. of England. The coat of arms is said to have been then assigned to it of three legs in a kneeling attitude, the homage being to England, Scotland and Ireland.

Maud R., Humeston, Ia. Presbyterian, we believe.

Reader, Kalamazoo, Mich. We know of no authority on the making of the æolian harp. Write to some musical publication.

D. C., Waterloo, N. Y. It is estimated that the Jewish population of New York City at the present time is between 500,000 and 600,000. There are 1,500,000 (estimated) in the entire country.

THE PRESIDENT'S SERMON

Remarks Delivered by President Roosevelt at the Dedication of Grace Memorial Reformed Church, Washington, June 7

"I SHALL ask your attention to three lines of the dedication canticle: 'Serve the Lord with gladness: enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise. Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.'

"Three better lines could surely not be brought into any dedication service of a church; and it is a happy thing that we should have repeated them this morning. This church is consecrated to the service of the Lord, and we can serve him by the way in which we serve our fellow-men. This church is consecrated to service and duty. It was written of old that 'by their fruits ye shall know them'; and we can show the faith that is in us, we can show the sincerity of our devotion, by the fruits we bring forth. The man who is not a tender and considerate husband, a loving and wise father, is not serving the Lord when he goes to church. So with the woman; so with all who come here. Our being in this church, our communion here with one another, our sitting under the pastor and hearing from him the Word of God, must, if we are sincere, show the effects in our lives outside.

"We of the Reformed churches, have a peculiar duty to perform in this great country of ours—a country still in the making—for we have the duty peculiarly incumbent upon us, to take care of our brethren who come each year, from over seas to our shores. The man going to a new country is torn by the roots from all his old associations, and there is a period of great danger to him in the time before he gets his roots down in the new country; before he brings himself into touch with his fellows in the new land. For that reason I always take a peculiar interest in the attitude of our churches toward the immigrants who come to these shores. I feel that we should be peculiarly watchful over them because of our own history; because we or our fathers came here under like conditions. Now that we have established ourselves, let us see to it that we stretch out the hand of help, the hand of brotherhood toward the newcomers, and help them as speedily as possible to shape themselves, and to get into such relations that it will be easy for them to walk well in the new life.

"That is one form of duty peculiarly incumbent upon us, of these Reformed churches. But we are not to be excused if we selfishly sit down and enjoy gifts that have been given to us, and do not try to share them with our poorer fellows coming from every part of the world, who, many of them, stand in such need of the helping hand; who often not only meet too many people anxious to associate with them for their detriment, but too often too few, anxious to associate with them for their good.

"I trust that with the consecration of each new church of the Reformed creed in this our country, there will be established a fresh centre of effort to get at and to help for their good the people that yearly come from over the seas to us. No more important work can be done by our people; important to the cause of Christianity, important to the cause of true national life and greatness here in our own land.

"Another thing, let us so far as strength is given us, make it evident to those who look on and who care not of us, that our faith is not one of words merely, that it finds expression in deeds. One sad, one lamentable phase of human history, is that the very loftiest words, implying the loftiest ideas, have been used as cloaks for the commission of dreadful deeds of iniquity. We must in our lives, in our efforts, endeavor to further the cause of brotherhood in the human family; and we must do it in such a way that the men anxious to find subject for complaint or derision in the churches of the United States, in our church, may not be able to find it by pointing out any contrast between our professions and our lives.

"This church is consecrated here to-day to duty and to service, to the worship of the Creator, and to an earnest effort on our part so to shape our lives among ourselves and in relation to the outside world, that we may feel that we have done our part in bringing a little nearer the day when there shall be on this earth a genuine brotherhood of men."

"Throwing Out the Life-Lines"

In my journey around the world, I have reached this bustling city and given twelve addresses, with singing. I sang the "Life-Line" in the theatre Sunday, May 10, at Rev. G. Campbell-Morgan's address to men. Many have come to me at the close of the service and said they would lay hold of the line that saves. I will send you a note when I sail for Honolulu.

COMMUNION HYMN

BLESSED Jesus, slain for me,
Let me lose myself in thee,
While the emblems bread and wine
Stand before me make them mine,
Cleanse me from all sinful thought,
Saviour, keep and make me thine

Blessed Saviour, hope and guide,
Let my soul in thee abide,
While I eat and drink and pray,
Take all sin and guilt away,
Thou art mine and I am thine,
Saviour, keep, O keep, I pray.

Blessed Master, Christ and King,
Let me now thy praises sing;
While the world is shut apart,
Cleanse my wicked, sinful heart,
I in thee and thou in me,
Saviour, keep, O keep my heart.

REV. H. CLARKE COLEBROOK.

An Old Fashioned Custom

BY JOHN WILLIS BAER

THE average New England congregation, two hundred years ago, I am informed, would rise when the minister announced his text. Not in my lifetime in any church in the same way have I ever seen such reverence or respect for God's Word. I do not ask that the old-fashioned custom be revived in our present-day churches, but I am bold enough to suggest that our congregations be encouraged to show more reverence for the reading of the Bible in our regular church services.

How long shall the "habitual latecomer" be allowed to walk to his pew during the reading of the Word? Many pastors do well to insist that no one be seated while the "morning Bible Lesson" is being read. Ushers can have an important part in this reform, and yet a tactful word from the pulpit will do more to remind a careless people that nothing could more certainly show disrespect and irreverence for God's Word, than unnecessary noise or movements while selections from the Old or New Testaments were being read.

Let us one and all magnify that part of our worship. Let us do it for our own sakes, and for the example we may put before our young people.

An Exiled Prince

In a recent number of a French magazine appear a sketch of the life of a Russian Prince who became a disciple of Tolstoi. Originally he was much like other Russian nobles, but while he was in the army he killed one of the enemy in battle. The look of agony on the dying man's face horrified his slayer. He could not forget it. The thought that the man was a stranger to him, and though he did wear the enemy's uniform, had never done him any harm, weighed on his soul, and he quitted the army forever. Returning to his estates, he found the peasants poor and miserable. One man to whom he spoke, who was ploughing one of his fields, assured him that in two days he had not tasted food, and his appearance corroborated his statement. Further inquiries convinced him that the people who worked on his estate were always in a state of semi-starvation, and were little if any better off than in the old days of serfdom. He went to see Tolstoi, and under his advice studied the Bible. He then determined to give up the greater part of his estate to the people. His mother was exasperated, and appealed to the Government, on the ground that he was a crazy Socialist. He has been banished from the country and is now earning a livelihood in France. His name is Khilkoff.

Scripture Texts in Street Cars

On April 1, there were installed in the cars of the Third and Ninth Avenue "L" lines, New York, 129 choice texts of Scripture. Printed in blue, with a border of red, neat and attractive, they are speaking to the hearts of passengers, coming and going, the blessed Word of God. Philadelphia was the scene of a similar effort some years ago, with most gratifying results, and the same work has recently been inaugurated in Chicago. The situation of these texts among many advertisements serves to set off the sweetness and beauty of the Scripture assurances and invitations. The texts have been placed in the two lines mentioned at an expense of $254.00, which is mostly voluntary contributions from those who believe in using "guaranteed seed." This sum maintains the texts in the cars for three months (or until July 1st), and those who have the matter in hand are hoping that contributions will be sufficient to renew the contract and extend the work. W. C. Wentworth, 150 Nassau St., New York, the Secretary, will gladly furnish any information desired concerning this unique Gospel effort.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not invest a little more and get the best? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted citizens in all parts of the country. THE CHRISTIAN CITIZEN*

Christian Influence on Political Life a Purifying and Elevating One

WHEN Christ told the people who were trying to entrap him to "render unto Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, and to God the things that were God's," he laid down the principles of Christian citizenship that are to guide his followers for all time. The Christian is to be no plotter, no anarchist, no self-seeker. His ambition is to attain something far higher than place and power. He is a citizen of the Kingdom of God, and it is in the service of Christ that the rewards he prizes are to be attained. Realizing this fact, men have retired from the world into monasteries, and others, while mixing in the world, have held aloof from politics and affairs of government. But a clearer view of the Christian's duties has come with more education and intelligence. If the church is to be the salt of society, as Christ described it, the Christian must not shrink from civic duties. To absent himself from the polls, on the plea that politics involves contamination, is to surrender the right that he possesses and for the exercise of which he is responsible. There are political contests from which he is justified in holding aloof, if he finds that both parties are so corrupt that he cannot conscientiously support the candidates of either, but happily such conditions are becoming less common from year to year. There are indications in most of our cities and States of an increasing sense of right and justice and of the power of the public conscience. The attitude of the Christian community, the certainty that the votes of religious men will be cast in favor or against a certain policy, has to be taken into account by the politicians. The effect in many sections has been to purify politics, and, though much remains to be done everywhere, the trend is toward cleaner and better conditions. The good work should go on, and there is no better way than by the young people studying the principles of government and fitting themselves for public life. If they become able to think clearly and to speak sensibly, the influence of Christian character will give added weight to their utterances, and our politics, municipal, State and national, will be elevated.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society and the Baptist Young People's Union for July 5. Gen. 41:38-42; Acts 7:35, 36; Daniel 6:1-4.

DON'T WORRY

DON'T worry if you cannot have
The world as you desire,
But try to make the most of life
And happiness inspire;
A cheerful smile and sweet content
Add sunshine unto life,
And have the greatest power to Dispel its care and strife.

'Tis smiles that drive away life's gloom
And not sad worriment;
So let our lives in happiness,
Not discontent be spent.
Look up to God to find his light
To brighten every day,
And when the world seems to abuse,
Just look the other way.

And find the sunshine on beyond
The clouds that intervene,
Until the darkness passes by
And you the light have seen,
Don't worry, for to every cloud
A silver lining shines,
And with the sorrows of the soul,
God's solace e'er combines.

ISRAEL'S REJECTION OF GOD

The Change from a Theocracy to a Monarchy

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEN one who is a spiritual man, and in a responsible position, makes a mistake, it is more easy for those who are less spiritual to make mistakes also. All the elders of Israel—i.e., the representatives of the twelve tribes—gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and said unto him, "Behold thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways. Now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." Samuel could have little foreseen that his failure would have led to such a step on the part of all Israel as represented by the heads of the tribes. Israel was the only people upon earth directly governed by God himself. Samuel had done the best which he could think of in appointing his sons assistant judges, but his privilege was not to do or to think, but to refer all to God, who was his king and director. The people took advantage, and threw away their allegiance to God as their King.

God had foreseen that this would happen (Deut. 17:14-20), but it was never his will; and when he who is the "mighty One of Israel" shall fully purge his people, he says, "I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning" (Isa. 1:25, 30). Had his people trusted and obeyed him, he would have set them "on high above all the nations of the earth" (Deut. 27:1); but they did not value their high prerogative to be a separated people, and they must, as a people, eat the fruit of their own way before they will be ripe for the destiny which yet awaits them as a righteous people ruling over the whole earth. "Make us a king," they cried, "to judge us like all the nations." But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, "Give us a king to judge us." And Samuel prayed unto the Lord. He saw in them the declension from God which they did not see. They wanted external power and external glory; they wanted to be equal to other nations, and to vie with them in military power.

How like this are the churches of the present day. Beautiful structures for the eyes of man; beautiful music for the ear of man; talented preaching to gratify the intellectual tastes of man, and in which man can vie with man; something external, something that the world can take account of and patronize! And what is there to attract the eye of God, to lead him to incline his ear? What is there which makes room for our unseen God to manifest himself and show forth his power and glory! What is there which is in accordance with the meek and lowly carpenter of Nazareth, whose pulpit was a fisherman's boat, or a mountain side; but who always brought his hearers into touch with the living God, and who left behind him forgiven sinners, broken hearts, humbled consciences, healed bodies, and transformed lives?

"Samuel prayed unto the Lord"; he did not repeat his mistake by taking things now into his own hands. And the Lord explained himself to his trusted servant. It was against his mind, for "He gave them a king in his anger" (Hos. 13:11); but he had a deep-laid purpose to teach his people, through their repeated mistakes, how unable they were to govern themselves. Their own will and way was fersely described in the solemn words: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thine help" (Hos. 13:9). The Lord said unto Samuel, "Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them." They virtually deposed God as their king! They believed they could do better for themselves, than God could or would do for them. "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign."

And yet, Samuel, thou has fellowship with me; thou dost understand me, and I understand thee. "According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt, even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods; so do they also unto thee. Now, therefore, hearken unto their voice; howbeit, yet protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them."

ANY BOY CAN GO

ARCHIE EADIE sells THE SATURDAY EVENING POST in a small town in New Jersey. One morning last summer he eagerly watched a crowd of people boarding an excursion train for the big camp meetings at Ocean Grove, and he found that he was going with them. He had a little more than enough money for car fare, but nothing for board and spending money. Then an idea came to him. He wrote to the publishers of THE POST to add 100 copies to his order for that week and to send them to him at Ocean Grove. Two days later he was among those who boarded the excursion train.

When he got to Ocean Grove he found his copies waiting for him and started at once for the beach with a bundle of them. The knowledge that unless he sold the copies he would not have money to pay for his board gave extra vigor to his work. Up and down the boardwalk, into the pavilions, on the hotel porches and along the streets he went, offering the magazine. Wherever there was a crowd there was Archie. Late in the afternoon he went to the boarding house and engaged board for a week, tired but happy, for he had almost enough to pay the bill.

Before the end of the week he received a check for $5.00, one of the cash prizes offered monthly to THE POST boys. He wrote for 50 extra copies for the next week. These he readily disposed of and decided he would stay a few days longer. At the end of that time he returned home, sunburned and happy, with enough money left to order his next week's supply for home consumption. Archie is 12 years old. He writes: "That way of going to camp meeting suits me all right."

Any boy can sell THE SATURDAY EVENING POST after school hours and on Saturdays. No money required. We send ten copies free the first week. These supply the capital for the next week. Write to-day for the free copies and booklet showing photos of successful boys and describing their methods.

Don't be afraid to try it. If 6000 boys are making money this way, YOU can do the same.

OPENING DAY at our CHILDREN'S HOME at BEAUTIFUL MONT-LAWN

$150,000 Worth of Knowledge For Fifteen Dollars or Less

A Proposition Absolutely Unequalled and Almost Incredible but for the Guarantee of "The Christian Herald"

IN next week's issue, our Book Department will submit to the readers of this paper the Most Advantageous Book Proposition that we have ever been able to secure for the benefit of our readers. One of the most reputable American Publishing Houses has just completed a New Encyclopedia in Twelve Large Volumes, aggregating about 8,000 Extra Large Pages, set in Clear Type, Beautifully Printed and Very Handsomely Bound. Over $150,000 were expended on the Production of this Great Work of reference, and but one edition has been printed from the new plates, never before on the press.

We have Bought this Entire Edition, and though originally intended to be SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION THROUGH AGENTS, AT $36.00 FOR THE SET, we shall offer it in next week's paper at

$15 ON INSTALMENTS, $1 Down, and $1 a Month until paid;
$14 ON INSTALMENTS, $2 Down, and $2 a Month until paid;
$13 IF PAID SPOT CASH.

To Repeat—Spot Cash, $13; on Instalments of $2 a Month, $14; on Instalments of $1 a Month, $15, for the Greatest Encyclopedia of Recent Years.

This great work contains over 75,000 Encyclopedic Articles, 40,000 Geographical References, 12,000 Biographies, 50 Full-Page Plates, representing the historical and scientific achievements of the past century; more than a Thousand Wood Engravings in the text, and over 7,000,000 WORDS, contributed by more than Three Hundred SPECIAL Contributors and over Five Thousand Noted Specialists from all over the world.

Two Important Considerations

1st.—Please bear in mind that this Encyclopedia is New from the Foundation Up. Every line has been set within the past twelve months.

2d.—There are no patched plates and defaced pages, the invariable result of "doctoring" an old set of plates with a view to bringing it up to date.

One Set to Every One Hundred Subscribers

We have about 3,000 sets of this encyclopedia. They are now being bound. These sheets will probably not yield over 2,800 complete sets, because in so large a work, with so many inserts and Colored Maps, the wastage is very great. As we cannot secure Under Any Circumstances, or At Any Price, more than this first edition, this proposition will be Limited Absolutely to the number mentioned, hence, only about One in a Hundred of our subscribers will have an opportunity to take advantage of this most exceptional book bargain ever offered by us.

SEND US WORD TO-DAY!

We are publishing this preliminary notice for the express purpose of enabling such of our subscribers as would like to have us hold a set of the Encyclopedia until they can read our Detailed Description in next week's issue, to Send Us a Postal Card, asking us to hold the books for a reasonable time after next week's issue has appeared.

Therefore act quickly and to-day. Send a postal card to that effect, and we will reserve for you a set for a reasonable time after the appearance of our issue of July 8th.

BISHOP J. C. HARTZELL

A NATIVE VILLAGE IN ZAMBESIA

MISS NOLA F. B. E. HILLS

REDEEMING CHILD-SLAVES IN AFRICA

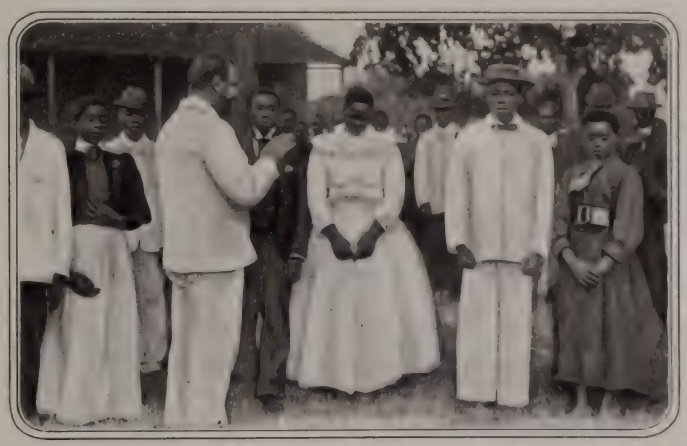
ALTHOUGH slavery, by the consent of the united Powers, has been officially abolished in Africa, that it still exists in many parts of the "Dark Continent" is made evident by the letters from missionaries that have lately come into the possession of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In Portuguese East Africa, for instance, it takes the form of "domestic slavery," and is practised by the natives themselves. Concerning the moral and physical evils that attend the system we shall let the writers of the letters speak. It is a system which calls loudly to the Christian Church for redress. It relates almost wholly to the children, and more especially to the girls.

Bishop J. C. Hartzell, the Methodist Missionary Bishop of Africa, following in the footsteps of the late Bishop Taylor, has nobly espoused the cause of child emancipation in Africa. The Rev. E. H. Richards, a missionary who has spent twenty-two years in the very heart of the field where the evil is strongest, stands side by side with the bishop in the child-saving crusade. There are, besides, many other missionaries who are intensely interested in the success of the movement, which will be felt in Zambesia, Angola, the Congo, Liberia, and wherever the natives still linger in the shadow of heathenism.

Describing the condition of the natives in the Inhambane district, Portuguese East Africa, Missionary Richards writes: "Polygamy is the common lot of man wherever he has the means of purchasing as many women as he will. The selling of daughters is a national, yea, a continental custom in Africa. This habit is denounced by most orthodox Christians, ignored by others, and sanctioned by a few. Essentially the custom is barbaric, and under civilized law or Gospel freedom, there is not the slightest excuse for its existence. As it exists here, the daughter is always the property of someone, either her father or nearest relative, who cares for the daughter after the heathen fashion till she is sought for as the wife of some one, of any age or any condition, provided the suitor has the common market price with which to purchase her.

"After years of observation, we are persuaded that sale is the proper term to use. The girl must be wed, willing or otherwise, whenever the father is willing to take the price; and, in all our experience, we have yet to see the parent who ever refused the first cash offered for his daughter, whether by youth or octogenarian (we are not speaking of Christian natives). We could bring into evidence six native women who would have been sold into helpless polygamy for life, had not the Christian people of America come to the rescue and paid the redeeming fee, and they are free. These are now Christian women, and every one, without exception, is a glory to our Mission and an honor to those followers of Christ, who retained for them their liberty. There are other cases, in which our Mission is carefully guarding the timid but trusting native young Christian girls, and will pay the redemption fee rather than see them sold into heathen polygamy. These girls may be redeemed at any time, if the Mission is ready to pay, for the heathen fathers are only anxious for the cash for their own flesh and blood. They have no farther thought. They may repel all Christian teaching, despise the missionary and hate the Christians, but, should the Mission offer the price, they will cheerfully surrender their children, with no question as to what shall become of them thereafter.

"These are undeniable facts, and worth study on the part of those who may consider this plan of caring for a heathen rather than any other child. We repeat it with emphasis, all the children now dwelling among the raw heathen are worthy of Christian mediation. They are all worth saving."



MISSIONARY RICHARDS CONDUCTING A NATIVE WEDDING AT INHAMBANE

This is the key to the situation. It has long been the conviction of Christian missionaries that, in order to evangelize Africa, we must begin with the children. Adult conversion follows, usually after a long and laborious effort, whereas the impressionable hearts of the children are quickly won. They yield to kindness and to Gospel teaching as no adult can do. If the child can be taken completely out of its heathen surroundings, and trained and educated at a Christian Mission, its moral and spiritual nature is developed, it acquires habits of order and industry, it receives a sort of life education, and, in a majority of cases, it ultimately goes out to its own people as an earnest worker for souls.

Bishop Hartzell, Missionary Richards and their associates, are now making a strenuous effort in the direction of child-adoption in Africa by the redemption plan. Hundreds of native heathen children are available for this purpose at the present moment. If the funds were provided, two hundred children could be taken out of their raw heathen surroundings, "redeemed" from slavery and adopted into the Mission home, where they would be trained and nurtured in the Gospel, and taught the usages of civilization. Behind these, in Zambesia alone, Mr. Richards writes, are two hundred other children, and these constitute only the fringe of a dense heathen population, which includes millions of little heathen boys and girls. To save the land, and bring it into the glorious Gospel light, we must begin with the children.

Bishop Hartzell has written for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this interesting description of the present condition of the natives in many parts of Africa:

"Domestic slavery is an established institution among all of the natives of Africa. You see it everywhere. You see women, with their waiting-men going with them to carry their effects, and to make a couch for them when they sleep, and to look after them.

"One particular case was that of a man named Bernardo and his wife. They had a slave girl. Bernardo is a most remarkable native, and the presiding elder of our missionaries could not handle him on this question. They discussed the matter with him, and both he and his wife said, 'We will not give up this slave.' A Southern slaveholder before the American Civil War could not have argued his case more thoroughly. So I had them go over it. I wrote them, after a little while, that they would have to give up the slave. Finally they gave her up. I said, 'You cannot be a slave holder and be in this Christian work, because the rank and file are looking to you as an example.' So they went away, and came back in an hour or so with a letter something like this:

"'In the year 1885, Bishop William Taylor came, and under him we received Jesus Christ. Now Bishop J. C. Hartzell comes, and we desire to remain Christians in the Kingdom of God, and we give up our slave.'

"That is an illustration of the struggle we are going through, away out among the black people. In taking care of the children, of course, we take care of the work.

"Here is a black man, his wife and child, and with them twelve, fifteen, or twenty acres. We can increase the work if we have the buildings. In another direction we have a large section of land, and I am going to ask the King of Portugal for six thousand acres.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

A Sermon by Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

WHEN a child is born, the attending physician makes out a birth certificate. This important document is sent to the fireproof building, where are preserved the county records. The omission of this certificate, or the improper filing of the same, might cause inestimable damage. Years hence, the lack of it might disinherit the child of large property interests, and involve many would-be heirs in interminable legal strife.

But though the birth certificate of an individual may be vigilantly guarded, it is not so carefully preserved as is the birth certificate of a nation. Then the sentimental as well as the intrinsic value place it above the price of silver and gold. If possible, it is carefully housed within the sacred hall wherein the nation was born. The paper upon which is written the Declaration of Independence, is the American nation's birth certificate. Other nations came to recognition by the slow processes of evolution, but the United States of America sprang into existence in a day, and this Declaration announced to an astonished world on July Fourth, 1776, the birth of a new member of the family of nations. As the young King Alphonso XIII. of Spain, having been born after the death of his father, has the unique distinction among sovereigns of being born a king, so the American Goddess of Liberty, at her first appearance, took her place in the world as a sovereign. The document in which she declared her sovereignty and her rights constituted the old Independence Hall of Philadelphia the most sacred building in American history, since within its walls is that sacred birth-chamber in which was first rocked the cradle of this new-born national infant. It publishes to the world that the men who signed their names at the foot of that immortal document, penned by Thomas Jefferson, in the little three-story red-brick house, still standing at the corner of Seventh and Market streets, Philadelphia, were the attending witnesses, whose testimony gave validity to that national birth certificate.

Text: Psalm 106: 5
That I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation

A Momentous Document

The Declaration of Independence as a document is our theme to-day. I am going to lay down upon my pulpit-desk a facsimile of this immortal paper. I do this for two reasons. First, it is the last Sabbath preceding our National Independence Day, hence it is fitting and appropriate for patriotic themes. The second reason is, that a few weeks ago, after the death of a very dear friend, the facsimile of the Declaration of Independence which I now place before you came into my possession. I have read it over and over again. I have read it in the chirography of Thomas Jefferson and in the handwriting with which the attending statesmen signed it. I have read it with all its corrections and interlineations. I have read it with entirely different feelings from those with which I used to regard it, when it came to me in cold and unimpassioned type. This most sacred document of American history appears to me in an entirely new aspect, and from it to-day I would glean some new moral deductions for the every-day struggles of our practical lives.

The Declaration of Independence was the startling culmination of manly intolerance of injustice. The document was not, as some people suppose, the result of a long and carefully-planned conspiracy extending over many years. It seemed rather to have been the outgrowth of the moment. It was the crystallization of sentiments, the results of which but few men could foresee. The British ministry had not anticipated it, neither had the American people. When the First Continental Congress assembled in Philadelphia, on September 5, 1774, there was probably not one prominent leader in all America who wished for national independence, with the sole exception, possibly, of Samuel Adams, of Boston. "Before the 17th of April, 1775," wrote Thomas Jefferson, "I had never heard a whisper of a disposition to separate from the mother country." "When I first took command of the army, July 3d, 1775, I abhorred the idea of independence," wrote George Washington in one of his letters, "but I am now convinced that nothing else will save us." All that the American Colony wished from England was not separation, but justice.

Immortal Principles

The two countries, in every essential part of their make up, were one. They spoke the same language. Many families had brothers and sisters, and other relatives in both countries. The children of prominent Americans were, for the most part, educated in English schools, where they were taught to reverence the British king. When Richard Henry Lee arose on the memorable 7th of June, 1776, and read the following resolution: "Resolved, that these United Colonies are and of a right ought to be free and independent States, and that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown," his own boy was at that time attending an English school. This American youth, some weeks later, was standing beside one of his teachers, when a visitor asked, "Who is that boy?" "He is the son of Richard Henry Lee," was the teacher's answer. Then the visitor placed his hand upon the lad's shoulder, and said, "Boy! we shall yet see your father's head upon Tower Hill!" To this the son replied, "Yes! you may have it when you get it!" If Richard Henry Lee for years had been conspiring for American independence, he would never have sent his son across the sea, to be educated under the domination and influence of the English Throne. The Declaration of American Independence was written and signed as a last resort, and because the British ministry would not listen to American petitions. It was written because King George with the fatuity of royal and imperial natures, imagined that he had the right to enforce his will on a people as resolute as himself. He believed that it was for him to command, and for them to obey, and that their protest against taxation without representation, was wicked rebellion against divinely constituted authority. It was written, because our forefathers believed that in a struggle for right and justice, God would be on their side, though they had to contend with a foe more powerful than themselves.

Standing here, in this year of grace, 1903, with our hands upon this venerable and sacred scroll, we may learn the mighty lesson that the really true, the great, the omnipotent and enduring government, is not that which rules by force of arms, but by the all-conquering power of justice, and of justice alone. This is of England's irreparable mistake in the year 1776. We have now a great nation, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the great lakes. A nation of over seventy million souls. But our people will remain a great nation only so long as they are an honorable and an honored people. Beware of the legislation that would make one law for the rich man, and another for the poor man. Beware of the law that would send an ignorant criminal to prison, and yet permit a brutally selfish coal baron to traffic in child labor. Beware of a social condition which makes it possible for capital to starve and grind down labor, while labor, with an honest heart, is ready to give capital a full day's work for a fair day's wage. Our laws should tolerate neither tyranny of capital nor tyranny of labor, but should afford equal protection to both, and facilitate mutuality of interests and friendly relations between them. It is only when a government honestly tries to administer equal justice and afford equal protection to all its subjects, that it gathers the robes of immortality about its loins. When a government, by unwise laws and administrative neglect, makes possible the enslavement or oppression of its seemingly helpless ones, such a government is paving the way for its own disintegration. Had King George III. been a wise ruler, and had Britain tried to be as just to the thirteen colonies in 1776, as she is honestly trying to be to her colonies at the present time, our country might have remained the brightest jewel in the British crown. Would that our own land, profiting by this great lesson, so closely interwoven with our national birth and childhood, might always be just to the helpless, the weak and the poor, as well as to the rich, the influential and the strong.

The strength of our present government is due to the fact, that it tries to be just to all its people, irrespective of class. "Ours is a government," said Theodore Roosevelt in a recent speech, "of liberty through and under the law. No man is above it, and no man is below it The crime of the cunning, the crime of greed, the crime f violence, all are equally crimes, and against them all ike, the law must set its face. This is not, and never hall be, a government of the plutocracy or of the mob. is, as it has been, and as it will be, a government of e people, including alike the people of great wealth, moderate wealth, the people who employ others, the eople who are employed—including them all, protect- g each and every one, if he acts decently and square- , and discriminating against any one, if he does not act quarely and fairly, if he does not obey the law. While all eople are foolish if they violate the law, or rebel against wicked as well as foolish, but all foolish, yet the most oolish man in this Republic is the man of wealth who omplains because the law is administered with impartial stice." May God always continue to give to us for e office of Chief Executive, men who are Presidents the whole people, who will see that the Government not a Wall street hireling, or a gigantic monopolizing usts' employee; who will protect rich as well as poor, lack as well as white, Jew as well as Gentile, woman's rtue as well as man's honor; who will not cringe to a ass, but who will protect all honest people alike!

Historic Names

The Declaration of Independence proves the power f inherited character. I am not nearly so much im- ressed with the surnames which have been placed at he foot of this important document, as I am by the mily names themselves. When I mention certain mes, there seems to cluster about them many other mes. John Adams! Who was he? "He was our colos- s in debate," wrote Jefferson. But as I speak the name f John Adams, I speak also of Samuel Adams, John uincy Adams, Charles Francis Adams, Senior and unior, and other Adamses who have added lustre to he Adams' name. When I speak the name of Richard lenry Lee, who prepared the famous resolution, the utcome of which was this Declaration of Independence, see a great number of Virginia Lees passing before he: Arthur, and Francis Lightfoot, and Robert Ed ard, and Fitzhugh, and greatest of all, Robert E. Lee, e "Pride of the South," and the loved and honored of he North. When I speak the name of Benjamin Har- ison, another signer, we find him the father of William I. Harrison, the ninth president of the United States, nd the great grandfather of Benjamin Harrison, the wenty-third president of the United States. The name f Philip Livingston, among the signers, suggests those f Robert R., and Edward, and William. Roger Sher- an, who was one of the great speakers at this conven- ion, was a member of the distinguished Connecticut amily of that name, among whose descendants is the resent able Senator from Massachusetts, George Fris- ie Hoar. Elbridge Gerry's name suggests not one Elbridge Gerry, but many Elbridges. Morris not only neans Lewis Morris, but also that of his great brother, Gouverneur Morris. The recounting of these family names alone would prove conclusively that there is Something in Heredity

When a man is of good ancestral stock, it is not as dif- icult for him to be good or great as if he were born a nobody, the grandson and the great grandson of nobodies.

My friends, in whose veins flows the blood of ancestors who fought at Bunker Hill, and Brandywine, and Saratoga, and Princeton, shall you not serve your coun- try as nobly and faithfully as did the soldier boys and the statesmen of 1776 and 1783? Can it be that we, whose forefathers had so glorious a share in the struggle for national independence, shall ourselves have no part, no honora- ble position in the struggles that are going on in 1903, to keep our nation pure, and good, and true? In olden times, the Scottish youths were inspired to deeds of valor by the knowledge that they were members of the clan MacGregor, or Campbell, or Stuart, or McCoy. They were inspired with the determination never to disgrace the family name. It is recorded that in one of the northern battles, the MacGregors were being driven back. Their chief rallied his fol- lowers and led them forth to a victori- ous charge, with the cry, "My men, come on! Come on! Fight like brave men! Your ancestors are to-day watch- ing you." So let us be brave and true to America's best interests, not only for our own sakes, but also for the sake of those illustrious ancestors who are watching us. Let this national anniver- sary be to us a day of consecration to the cause of right and freedom. As the mother of Hannibal led her son to the grave of Hamilcar, his sire, and there made him swear unceasing war against the enemies of his country, so may we, remembering the graves of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, pledge ourselves anew to the struggle against the evils which menace the greatness and righteousness of the na- tion that they established.

The Declaration of Independence is an encouraging assurance that, in every crisis of our country's history, God, if we trust Him, will always raise up the right men for the right place. Who was Thomas Jefferson, the penman of the Declaration of Independence? "Oh," you answer, "he was one of the greatest Americans who ever lived. He was the third President of the United States. He was a man at whose mental acumen and noble, patriotic purposes, the more you study him the more you marvel. He was not a cringing politician, but a statesman who could discern the future with the far seeing eyes of a prophet and a seer." True; all that you say in reference to the sage of Monticello is true. There was not at the time of his death a name more revered than that of Thomas Jefferson. But who was Thomas Jefferson in 1776? He was only thirty- three years of age. He had just entered public life, and had become a member of the Virginia delegation but a few months before. In the realm of debate, he could not be classed among the great advocates. John Adams, Roger Sherman, Oliver Walcott, Lee, and George Wythe. As a writer, he had no such influence in fostering the independence idea as had Samuel Adams. For the most part, in the deliberations of the Continental Congress, he sat as a sphinx with closed lips. Yet, because Richard Henry Lee had proposed the resolution of Secession, and also because Lee was compelled to absent himself from Congress, on account of his sick wife, and, as Congress wanted to honor Virginia, by appointing a Virginian in Lee's place, this master-mind, the young and comparatively unknown Thomas Jefferson, was pushed forward, and he became the author of the famous Declaration of Independence.

I repeat, in the great crisis of national affairs, God, if we only trust him, will give us the right men for the right places. Did he not give the right man for the right place when he gave Thomas Jefferson as the writer of this immortal document? Did he not give the right man for the right place, when George Wash- ington became the head of the American armies? Did not God give the right man for the right place, when, at the breaking out of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln became President of the United States? Did not God give us the right man for the right place, when William McKinley sat in the White House, and calmly and bravely guided the affairs of State during the Spanish- American trouble? And shall not God raise up and inspire our future leaders, if the American people are a Godly nation, and look to him for Divine guidance?

Signed by Heroes

But reading again between the lines of this immortal document, I see in it the evidence of God-given courage. There is a solemnity and a heroism in its utterances, which come only from faith in God, and dependence upon him. The men who signed this paper were brave men. The last few words which Thomas Jefferson wrote at the end of the last page, indicate their cour- age. "And for the support of this Declaration, we mu- tually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." They pledged their lives. Each man knew that the signing of this document, which, a few hours later, was publicly read by John Nixon, from the balcony of the State House, made each one of the signers, a traitor in the eyes of England, and a fit subject for the gibbet and Tower Hill. Yet when John Hancock knew that he might be signing his own death warrant, he picked up his pen and wrote in large, bold letters his name, "John Hancock." "Now as he put down his pen, he remarked, "There my name is large enough that King George will be able to read it with- out spectacles."

The signers pledged their fortunes, as well as their lives. Had the Insurrection been a failure, their per- sonal properties would have been confiscated. When the millionaire, Charles Carroll, signed the Declaration, a bystander flippantly remarked, "There goes a few mil- lions of dollars if the cause is unsuccessful." Yes, as dead in earnest was Carroll in the cause of Amer- ican liberty, that lest his name should be confounded with that of another Charles Carroll he specified and individualized his name as he signed it: "Charles Car- roll, of Carrollton."

The Congress at Prayer

But while the members of the Continental Congress of 1776 were brave men, they were also as a class, praying men. True courage and consecration are brothers. They were men who believed in God. They were men who, down upon their knees, reverently and earnestly and intensely sought divine light. In the famous historical picture, the members of the second Continental Congress are shown on their knees in prayer. To the Christian American student that picture ought to be the most impressive historical painting ever hung in legislative hall, or in foreign or domestic art gallery. I have seen the noted war pictures of Berlin and Dresden. I have seen the form of Emperor William the First in many scenes, flanked by Von Moltke, and the nation's hero, Prince Bismarck. In Paris, I have seen the Napoleonic pictures, and in London the war pictures of Waterloo, where the pale faced Wellington immovably sits his horse, watching the destruction of the French grenadiers. But in all the art galleries of the world there is no his- torical picture that, to my mind, is so impressive, so significant, so full of inspiration as that historic picture of the Continental Congress in prayer.

Most of the members of that Congress came from praying Christian homes. They assembled in the spring and summer of 1776 to take the most momentous step which the citizens of any country can take. It was no light or trivial act to renounce allegiance to King George and to defy the power of the British Govern- ment. These men well knew the consequences in- volved in such a step, and realized the necessity of hav- ing divine guidance. One of the members arose and moved that a prominent Episcopalian minister of Phila- delphia should be sent for and asked to lead the mem- bers in prayer to God. Samuel Adams, I think it was, seconded that motion. He said in substance, "I am not an Episcopalian, but I am not a bigot. I feel that God's hand must lead us in this national crisis. I sec- ond the motion." The motion was carried. The next day this Episcopalian minister came to the legislative hall. He came in full canonical robes. All the mem- bers knelt. I can well believe that all must have joined in the prayer that the God of the Armies of Moses and of Joshua would lead and guide them. How on any other assumption can we explain their dauntless cour- age? It would have been sheer temerity for those men to sign that Declaration, unless they had believed that God would be with them in the struggle that must ensue. And their faith was justified by the result. The God who heard the pleading of the Israelites in the Wilder- ness heard the prayers of that Conti- nental Congress. In his providence England was not left free to use her strength in crushing the infant nation. The life and death struggle in which she had to engage nearer home curtailed her power, and to that fact, due to the over- ruling mercy of God, our forefathers owed their success. O, my fellow coun- trymen, let us on this anniversary ex- ercise the faith that our fathers had in the God of nations. May we continue to pray as our ancestors prayed in 1776, and in 1812, and in 1861. May we feel as a nation that our God will listen to our petitions, whether lifted in church pulpit or in the legislative hall.

Thus, on this glorious National holi- day, I want you to take the Declaration of Independence, which is our birth certificate, and place it between the leaves of your Bible. There may it speak to us as Christian citizens and as individuals. While it reminds us of the patriotism and sublime heroism of our fathers, may it also remind us of the obligation devolving upon us to redeem our beloved land from the plague of sin, and to promote, as far as in us lies, the righteousness which alone exalteth a nation. And as individuals may it re- mind us of our high privileges as citi- zens in the kingdom of God. When assailed by temptation and by the evil that would submerge us in unrighteous- ness, may we remember the Declaration of Independence which Christ signed for us with his own blood, and realize in our own lives the truth of his words, "If the Son make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

House in which Jefferson Wrote the Declaration of Independence

Since the official announcement that the Declaration of Independence, having begun to fade, would be retired forever from public view hereafter, there has been a great revival of patriotic interest in the subject. It does not seem to have occurred to the American mind, that the glorious "Charter of our Liberties"—penned by Jefferson and adopted by the Continental Congress and signed by the Im- mortals, who, when they appended their names, flung their lives into the balance—could become so dim with age as to be well nigh illegible, yet such is the case. But, fortunately, the grand Declaration while it was yet clear and legible, was reproduced by authority of the State Department. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in possession of two of these authorized facsimiles, and it has reproduced them in the identical form, size and tint of the original Declaration itself. This priceless memento of our Nation's Independence should be in the hands of every American, old or young. It is a really beautiful work of art, 26 x 31 inches, and it is accompanied by a pamphlet, which tells in graphic language the story of the Declaration, with the portraits of the signers and the history of "Old Glory"—the birth of our Nation's Flag. Altogether, a most timely and appropriate souvenir, which should be hung up in every patriotic home on the morning of July Fourth. The Pathos of the Great Western Floods

MR. GEO. STUMPF, HEAD OF RELIEF WORK — HOLDING RELIGIOUS SERVICES ON THE TENT GROUNDS, KANSAS CITY, KAN. — CHIEF OF POLICE, ZIMMER

IN the great floods which swept along the territory bordering the Missourf, Mississippi, and Kansas Rivers, there were many pathetic incidents. Men displayed the heroism of romance and tragedy; women were as valiant as the men, and the bravery of even childhood was shown. The charity of mankind was severely tested. There was no tiring of the doing of good deeds; no laggards who hung back in the work of rescue.

During the flood that destroyed Venice, and Granite, and Madison City, and inundated East St. Louis, the writer visited the places named as the flood receded. At East St. Louis, the women and children clung to their husbands and fathers when the rescue boats came to their doors, giving the oft repeated reply to the life-savers: "Our homes are here. It is all we have in the world. We will stay here another day." The following morning, when the floods had driven them into the second story, they still held out, and it was not until many were forced to the roofs that they were willing to take to the boats for rescue.

In Madison City, a small manufacturing town, the shops kept on until the waters put out the fires. Workers remained at the post of duty even while the waters of the Mississippi crept slowly toward their homes. A sturdy young workman in one of the factories at Venice was sent to St. Louis for provisions. He kissed his wife and children farewell, and told them to remain indoors while he was absent. Danger surrounded him on all sides. As he was crossing the Merchant's Bridge upon the return trip, he was met by fleeing refugees, who said his family had been swept down stream by a sudden rise of the current.

Heroic work was done in East St. Louis the day and night previous to its complete inundation. A heavy wind sprang up and carried the angry waves of the river against the dikes thrown up to protect the city. A thousand volunteers turned out. Among these were fifty or more society women of East St. Louis. Thousands of sacks of sand were thrown against the improvised dikes. At dusk it looked as if the battle was won. But the women remained in the cook shacks along the waters' edge, and the men brought torches and stuck them in the earth along the dike front. Patrols were arranged and it was thought wise to wait and watch. It was a night of terror in the city of forty thousand souls. Shortly after midnight came the great break. A quick lunge was made toward the space which had been forced apart by the waves, and it was found that four feet of water was pouring through upon the unprotected city. The cry of warning was sounded in the night. The rush of waters was outdone by the blowing of whistles and the ringing of bells. Women and children were bundled upon Eads' bridge and told to escape to St. Louis; the men remained behind. From midnight until break of dawn the great bridge was lined with refugees, thinly clad and crying in fear. The lower section of St. Louis having been awakened by the cries of danger, opened house and cared for the homeless. Many of the women left their little ones with friends and returned to the East side, to save, if possible, some of the household effects and warn the husbands and fathers to come away in time.

REFUGEES IN TENTS

A most pathetic incident of the great flood was the birth of a baby to a mother of the poorer class in the East St. Louis lowly district. The husband was forced to work along the dike as a paid laborer to buy food for his wife, and was so employed at the time of the break in the levee. He rushed to save his wife, after the flood had destroyed the dike upon which he toiled. He was barely in time to grasp her and the new-born child into his arms and rush them across the river, before the waters had swallowed up his little home. The mother and child, strange to relate, did not die of exposure, although their ultimate fate was lost track of by the newspapers in the excitement of the tragedy that floated over the entire city. WM. R. DRAPER.

Relief work is progressing favorably at Kansas City, Topeka, Venice, Madison, Granite City, and other points where the recent inundations caused the greatest suffering. Our photographs on this page show scenes in Topeka during the floods, and will enable the reader to form an impression of the condition of a city under water.

From the Mayor of Argentine, Kan., we have received this appeal:

This is a place of 6,500 people. The recent flood rendered 3,000 homeless. The population is composed of laboring people. Hundreds lost their houses, furniture and clothing. Some have not a change of clothing. One-half of the stores in town are filled with water to the ceilings. The water entered the second story of many of the houses and completely submerged cottages. The mud is a foot deep in the houses and on the streets. It has an odor, and must cause sickness. We need help to remove the mud, cleanse the sewers, repair the houses and care for the sick. D. E. CLOPPER, Mayor.

Contributions for the sufferers sent to this journal will be forwarded to Topeka, Kansas City, and Argentine.

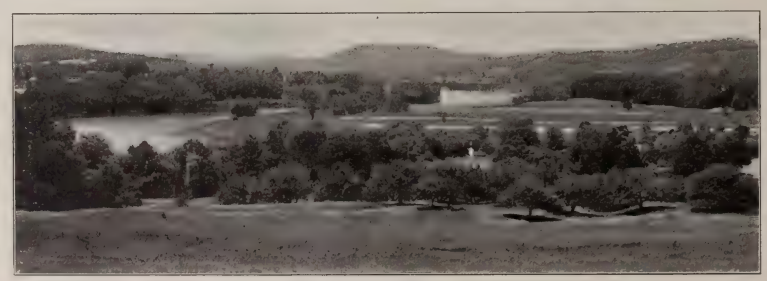
Northfield's Coming Meetings

HOW real, in all essential matters, is the union among Christ's people, may be seen by the programme now issued for the season, at Northfield, Mass. It is exceptionally rich in the number and eminence of the men who will conduct the meetings; but the conspicuous feature of it, which must impress all who see it, is the variety in the creeds and nationalities and spheres of work to which they belong. Apart from the good that is done at Northfield every year; besides the stimulus imparted there to the spiritual life of those who attend and, afterwards, carry the blessing far and wide, there is the great and impressive lesson which the programme presents of men differing so widely in so many ways, being drawn together by a common love of their Lord, and a common desire to attain higher development in efficiency of service. It shows how rapidly the spirit of love and brotherhood in Christ is growing, when such assemblies as those that will gather at Northfield this summer can be held.

The late Dean Stanley used to tell a story, which he called "Wesley's dream." It was that Wesley dreamed he was permitted to approach the gate of heaven, and that he asked if there were any Calvinists within, and was answered in the negative. Were there any Roman Catholics, and again the answer was, "No." There were Episcopalians, surely? But he was told there were not. Any Congregationalists or Baptists? No. Were those who had been admitted to the blessed abode all Wesleyans then? Still the answer was in the negative; there were no Wesleyans there. Who, then, had attained the coveted privilege of entering there? The reply was that all the inmates were Christians.

Northfield has that characteristic among others in its resemblance to heaven upon earth. Baptists stand side by side with Episcopalians, Presbyterians with Methodists and Congregationalists with them all. And there are no national prejudices which separate the Christians one from another. Besides the American hosts, there are representatives of Canada, England, Germany, France and Japan. In their work, too, there is a still more extensive reach. When, in August, the Conference of Christian Workers is held, there will be present missionaries from heathen lands, who will be able to tell their brethren of the triumphs of the Cross in strange countries and among alien peoples, with whom, by long years of labor, they have identified themselves. Northfield has seen many interesting gatherings in past years, but none more interesting than those which will be seen there this season.

One of the foreign teachers, who is a newcomer at Northfield and will be sure of a hearty welcome, is the Rev. Reginald Campbell, who has succeeded Dr. Joseph Parker at the London City Temple. The young man who has stepped by a single bound into the leadership of British Nonconformity is a man of striking personality. His utterances are as sententious as those of his illustrious predecessor, and there is a sweet, loving, sympathetic tone in them that carries them straight to the heart. His coming is anticipated with intense interest. Another Englishman whose fame has preceded him is the great Samuel Chadwick, known far and wide as "Chadwick, of Leeds." With them comes Rev. George Jackson, of Edinburgh; Prof. Orr, of Glasgow, and Rev. Griffith Thomas, Rector of St. Paul's, Portman Square, London. All these men have a high reputation in Great Britain, not only for scholarship and mental ability, but for deep spirituality and devotion.



THE CONNECTICUT VALLEY—VIEW AT NORTHFIELD

The rich list of Europeans, however, does not mean a dearth of Americans on the Northfield platform. The contrary is true. The rapid growth of the attendance at Northfield has heralded similar increase in the number of speakers. A partial list of the men who will speak there includes: Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Yale University; Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, East Northfield; Mr. Robert E. Speer, New York; Mr. John R. Mott, New York; Rev. Cleland B. McAffee, Chicago; Rev. R. A. Torrey, Chicago; Rev. H. C. Mabie, D.D., Boston, Mass.; Dr. W. F. McDowell, New York; Miss Margaret Slattery, Fitchburg, and Pres. Mary Woolley, of Mt. Holyoke College.

The specific dates for the larger conferences are: World's Student Conference, June 26 to July 5; Northfield Summer Bible School, July 1 to July 29; Young Women's Conference, July 7 to July 15; General Conference for Christian Workers, July 31 to Aug. 16; Post Conference Addresses, Aug. 18 to Sept. 20.

OPENING DAY AT MONT-LAWN

Our Beautiful Children's Home Once More Filled with Little Tenement Waifs

IF those of our readers who have become personally interested in our Fresh-air work at Mont-Lawn and have contributed towards its success, could have seen the Home on its opening day last week they would indeed have been gratified. Never has Mont-Lawn looked prettier than this summer; never has the grass looked greener, the cool shade of the tall pines and maples more inviting, or the great dormitories sweeter, cleaner or whiter than now. Over two hundred children were now accommodated there, under the care of a corps of trained Christian workers, among whom are several who have been in the missionary field, while all have had more or less experience in religious work.

It would be hard indeed to picture a more delighted party of children than those who formed the first group of arrivals at the Home. After the sail up the Hudson on the steamer Chrystenah, they reached the Home by four stages in time to do justice to a wholesome and appetizing supper, which Housemother Collins and her staff of workers had prepared for them. To many of these children it was their first experience in the country, and the green fields, the flowers, the waving foliage, the songs of the birds were all subjects of wondering comment. In the party some half-a-dozen different nationalities were represented; but our little folks were on common ground in the childish enjoyment of the delightful outing which had been provided for them through the liberality of the good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A programme of unusual interest is planned for the Fourth, which is always a memorable day at Mont-Lawn. Everything is made to give place to the fullest enjoyment on that day. There will be the always delightful patriotic exercise, "The Raising of The Flag," the march to the little chapel, and the singing of patriotic songs, then a frolic at various games and the swings, a royal dinner in honor of the holiday, little recitations by the children, and, in the evening, a fine display of fireworks furnished by Dr. Klopsch for the amusement of our little guests. A number of the friends and patrons of the Home have been invited to attend the Fourth celebration at Mont-Lawn, and these will share the pleasure of the children on that occasion.

This year there is a new and very charming addition to the enjoyment of our little guests at Mont-Lawn. It is a "Children's Garden"—a real, natural kindergarten—in which there are little beds of flowering plants and hardy annuals. These little garden patches, which have been all nicely prepared in advance, and now look like a variegated floral checkerboard, are for the children themselves. Our wee tenement lads and lasses are to be the gardeners, and with their diminutive tools they will spend many a pleasant hour this summer among their posies—of course, under a capable instructor, who can tell them just what to do. Bouquets and boutonnières are in constant demand among the children, who never tire of gathering the wildflowers that bloom in abundance around Mont-Lawn. Their own little garden patches will supplement these very prettily this year.

In a spiritual sense, Mont-Lawn is itself a great kindergarten, where the good seed is sown every summer, much of which has already borne fruit. It is expected that nearly three thousand tenement children will be sheltered and fed at the Home this season. Simple religious instruction is a prominent feature of the work, and as in past years, every effort will be made to reach the hearts of those dear little ones and to plant there the seeds of Divine truth which shall influence their entire lives.

Contributions in aid of our Fresh Air Home will be welcomed and duly acknowledged. It costs $5 to send a slum child to the Home for ten days, and $21 will endow a little white cot at Mont-Lawn for the entire season (with the good donor's name framed above it). Gifts of clothing may be sent to Housemother Collins at the Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y. Contributions of money should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Benediction on Murder

ONE of the items of news that comes from Servia referring to the recent murder of the king and queen of that country, cannot be regarded otherwise than as ominous for the future of the people. It appears that the two legislative assemblies, with the chief officers of the army, went in state to the Cathedral of Belgrade, to attend a thanksgiving service, at which the Te Deum was sung. The chief bishop of Servia officiated and made an address, in which, while deploring the necessity for the assassinations, he "thanked the army for what it had done, and praised its behavior."

What can be expected of a country in which the principal religious authority, speaking in a church dedicated to Christ, can speak of the "necessity" for assassination? There is reason to fear that the people of that country will learn a most pernicious lesson from such words. They may be recalled whenever a king or a statesman becomes unpopular; and men in private life may remember them when some rival or enemy arouses their resentment. Necessity for assassination there can never be, and the use of the words by a minister of religion is a direct encouragement to lawlessness.

Lest any doubt might exist as to the bishop's meaning, he went so far as to applaud the perpetrators of the foul and cowardly murders, and to thank them for committing them. There have been occasions when justice demanded that the life of a ruler of a country should be taken, and we can understand that no harm might be done to the moral sense of a country by bringing such ruler to trial, and executing him under process of law. But that men should be praised for committing cold-blooded murders is not only wicked, but is foolish, and must inevitably lead to a contempt for law, which is degrading to a civilized nation and menacing to its future welfare.

The "Get-Rich-Quick" Mania

IT is astonishing to what an extent the passion for acquiring wealth quickly and easily has spread within the last few years. Recent developments, in connection with the Post Office investigation now in progress, have revealed the fact that the mails have been used by a very large number of bogus syndicates and get-rich-quick concerns, without the slightest effort being made to check their criminal schemes for fleecing the unwary. In this way, and by means of advertising, the plunderers who prey upon the credulity of the ignorant, the covetous, and the simple, have reaped a rich harvest. They have numbered their victims by the tens of thousands. Now, however, it would seem that tardy justice is at last thoroughly aroused and on their track. Let us hope, for the sake of public morality, no less than for the protection of the innocent and unsuspecting, who are the victims of these plunderers, that the riddance will be sweeping and permanent.

It is undeniable that the secret desire to accumulate riches is almost universal, and it is true, moreover, that a very great majority are not especially scrupulous concerning the source from which the wished-for wealth may come. This the get-rich-quick swindler knows; he is a good judge of human nature, and knows how to bait his trap to take advantage of its weakness. From his den in New York, or some other busy centre, he sends out broadcast, by letter and newspaper advertisement, his dazzling propositions, showing how the farmer, the artisan, the country minister, the physician, the struggling shopkeeper, the clerk, the widow with a small pittance left by her dead husband, may double, treble, quadruple their little capital in a twinkling, "by our absolutely safe method and without risk"—all specious lies, of course, yet readily swallowed by the poor dupes, whose judgment is blinded by their hot desire for wealth. With these swindlers, letter-writing is a fine art; for their letters are cleverly worded, and while holding out the most alluring possibilities to the receivers, are carefully guarded, so that the writer may escape any legal responsibility for the same.

The circulars they send out make a powerful appeal to the avarice of the credulous, and they succeed wonderfully. For a loan of $10.00 they will promise to pay in return $1.00 a week. For $50.00 they will pay $5.00. But they only make these payments to induce foolish people to plunge still more heavily. As a result, multitudes of men and women impoverish their homes, while others even steal money from their employers and friends to speculate. The temptation is so great for the time that many persons become money-mad. Thus every get-rich-quick concern is a generator of crime and suicide. In one year one of these "syndicates" pocketed no less than $2,000,000. When the exposure and the final crash came, hundreds of people—if not thousands—were made penniless. And a number of the victims, when they saw the inevitable ruin they had brought on themselves and their families by their mad speculation, committed suicide. When the police took possession of the offices of the concern, they found letters that had come from poor people all over the country, who had sent in their last dollar. They had expected that their money would be doubled in a few days! Many of the poor made pathetic appeals to have their money returned, but the hard-hearted swindlers had disappeared.

This is a sample case, but, in the main, it applies to all the get-rich-quick swindles alike. All are dishonest, immoral, and in the last degree ruinous to the poor victims.

For the great majority of the dupes of the get-rich-quick swindlers, there can hardly be as general or generous a sympathy as might have been extended under other circumstances. They have been caught in their own net; their cupidity has been their undoing. They made haste to get rich, forgetting that "he that getteth riches and not by right . . . at his end shall be a fool." Had they been wise, they might have detected the sharp, cruel hook under the glittering bait of the get-rich-quick operator, and they would have been content with the reward of honest industry or legitimate trade, instead of grasping greedily at an elusive and fabulous profit, the very nature and extent of which should have convinced them that it could not be lawfully and honorably earned, if earned at all.

We frequently receive letters from readers in the country, making inquiry as to the "reliability" of some get-rich-quick scheme, from whose conductors they have received the usual attractive circulars. These circulars read like a fairy tale. They tell how the kind-hearted broker is longing to add to your income, and, if you will simply follow the advice he gives you, wealth will fly to you on wings. We invariably advise the receivers of such letters to give them no attention. A moment's reflection ought to convince any man or woman, no matter how inexperienced in business affairs, that if the good-natured, persuasive broker, or any one else, had something that is reliable and that will bear investigation, he could interest all the capital needed without the slightest difficulty. He would not be obliged to hawk his scheme around among strangers, begging them to invest in it.

We repeat the advice to all our readers: Let get-rich quick schemes severely alone; resist the temptation to acquire wealth in any such way. Be assured that every such scheme is simply a blind trap, a bunco game, an out-and-out lying swindle. Thousands are ruined every year by yielding to the unholy fascination. Avoid it as you would avoid a pestilence.

Our Daily Speech

POVERTY of vocabulary and infelicity of diction characterize far too much of our daily speech. We are often so afraid of seeming pedantic that we use in conversation a less beautiful and charming style of language than we might; our thoughts are clothed in shabby garb instead of wearing fine raiment. Homespun words need not be shabby, nor is there necessarily elegance in elaborate phrase and stilted sentence. The word that most clearly and correctly expresses one's meaning, whatever its derivation, is the best word for the occasion. But, in many families, the lack of rich and ornate English is painfully conspicuous. Children have little facility in their choice of words, because they habitually hear commonplace and inadequate language, spoken in a slovenly and haphazard manner.

The best means of correcting bad habits in ordinary speech is easily within reach. The English of good books is better than the English of the hastily compiled newspaper, but in this intensely competitive and hurrying period, the bulk of our people limit their reading to the latter and neglect the former. Daily reading of the Bible at family prayers does more than promote spiritual growth. Indirectly and incidentally it fills the mind and memory with similes, proverbs, phrases, and sentiments, which are for the elevation of thought and the enrichment of speech. Reading aloud from Shakespeare or Milton, or from some master of English, like Scott, Carlyle, Thackeray, or Stevenson, if daily practiced, will insensibly change and improve the quality and character of ordinary talk.

The children in a very plain and very simple American household, are distinguished among their friends for a happy knack of hitting the best word in their talk, and for a very much wider vocabulary than most young people under sixteen possess. Their mother thus explains it, "Jack and I have always made it a part of our duty to the children to read to them. They have been familiar with good English from their nursery days."

We should, in our own talk, avoid affectation, but should not fear to use a beautiful word in its proper place, more than we should hesitate at assuming court raiment were we going to a palace. All our lives we are in the court of the King, and we should behave as befits the King's children.

The Bible Censored

WE have been accustomed for many years past to criticisms of the Bible, and to suggestions more or less valuable of improvements in its diction. These have come mainly from Christian scholars, and they have been generally done in a reverent spirit and with the motive of making the sacred Book more accurate in its rendering of the original and more intelligible to readers. Another censor has now entered the field, whose motive is of quite a different kind. This is the Turkish Government censor, who makes two peculiar suggestions. He has been examining the Bible, before giving his permission for the latest consignment of the Turkish translation, sent by the American Bible Society, to be circulated. Two passages are objected to by this officer. One of them occurs in Paul's first Epistle to the Thessalonians, 1: 7, in which Paul tells the church that it was "an ensample to all that believe in Macedonia." The censor points out that there is no region accurately bearing that name. He will not object if the passage is changed to read, "All that believe in the villayets of Salonika and Monastir." This objection will probably be overcome by the missionaries explaining the anachronism of the substitution. The second objection is doctrinal, and is more likely to be stubbornly defended. It occurs in Paul's first Epistle to Timothy, 1: 15, where the apostle says that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." The Mohammedan censor strenuously opposes this passage, on the ground that Mohammedan sinners ought to be exempted from Christian salvation. He insists that the passage be changed to read, "To save Christian sinners." We most earnestly hope that he will yield on this point, too. The passage so changed would be quite true, but it would not express the whole truth. Mohammedan sinners need to be saved, whatever the Turkish officer may think, and it is precisely to declare the fact that Christ is ready to save them, which is the object of sending the Bible into Turkey. It is singularly fatuous on the part of the Turk that he should have objected to this passage, which states a truth that is the one most capable of redeeming his nation.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Largest Battle-Ship in the World

WAR is not yet to be abolished either on land or sea. In spite of the Peace Conference at the Hague, which was specially designed to check the competition among the nations in preparations for war, the European governments continue to make larger efforts to bring their fighting capacity to the highest development. A significant illustration of the fact is the enormous vessel recently added to the British navy. It is the most formidable ship in the world, larger by a thousand tons than any vessel in the American, French or Japanese navies, and larger by three thousand tons than the largest vessel in any other navy. She is 425 feet in length and 78 feet wide, and her weight, before her guns are taken on board, is eight thousand tons. Her armor varies in thickness from seven to nine inches. A powerful battery of about fifty guns, four of which are twelve-inch, will be carried by the vessel, besides torpedo tubes. Triple expansion engines of eighteen thousand horse-power are expected to give her a speed of eighteen and a-half knots; and all the latest improvements in steering gear are to be utilized. The cost of the ship, apart from her armament, is six and a half millions dollars. It is obvious that the British Government is determined to keep its navy superior to that of any other Power and that it does not grudge the expense required to do so. No such mighty engine of war as this latest addition to its navy has ever sailed on the seas. Perhaps England's European rivals may now feel it their duty to build a ship to equal or even surpass it. So the struggle goes on, and nations have to pay the penalty of their mutual distrust in a rivalry which cripples their resources and entails heavy burdens on their people. Some day they must learn that it would have been better to heed the Apostolic warning:

If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another (Gal. 5: 15).

Heroes of the Flood

Two thrilling stories of heroism come from Heppner, Oreg., the city which was practically destroyed by the terrific cloudburst on June 21. The dispatches say that a man named Leslie Matlock mounted a horse directly he heard of the coming deluge, and rode at its utmost speed to Lexington, arousing the people there, who had barely time to make their escape to the hills. Continuing his course down the valley, he gave the alarm at the farmhouses until he reached Ione. Close behind him was the roaring torrent, sweeping trees and houses and everything before it. Many men would have turned aside to seek safety on the hills, but Matlock continued his wild ride until his horse fell exhausted. Getting a fresh mount he rode forward until he reached a telephone station, where he rang up the ranchers farther on. Hundreds must have been killed but for his exertions. Another act of heroism was that of James Kernan, the station-agent at Heppner. He had the news in plenty of time to make his escape, but he stayed at his post to send the warning of the coming disaster to people, who as he well knew, would be in danger. He remained at the telephone until the water was swirling through the office. Then he fled, but it was too late. One of his children was saved by a friend, but Kernan and his wife and his other child were all lost. Such heroism in the face of danger deserves the highest honor. It is Christ-like, for of Him, too, it was said:

He saved others, himself he cannot save (Mark 15: 31).

An Incongruous Premium

Some of the saloons in New York have recently followed the example of the stores in their neighborhood, in giving premiums to their customers. These are of various kinds, in which the tastes of the customers are consulted. Some of the saloon-keepers, however, have lately taken into account the fact that their customers may have wives and children who would appreciate articles that the customer himself might not want to use. So articles of a household and domestic use began to appear in the lists. One of the saloon-keepers has gone a step beyond the others. He now gives away a prayer-book to any customer who can show that he has had a certain number of drinks in the saloon. Lest, however, the prayer-book might lead to a loss of custom, he has taken the precaution of printing on the two blank pages at the end of the book, the advertisement of a special brand of whiskey, and the address of the saloon where it can be purchased. We hope the time will soon come when even a saloon-keeper will know that the person who uses a prayer-book is not to be inveigled into buying whiskey.

They shall not drink wine with a song; strong drink shall be bitter to them (Isa. 24: 9).

THE "COMMONWEALTH," THE LARGEST BATTLE-SHIP AFLOAT

A Threat of Secession

Our negotiations with Colombia for the right to complete the canal across the Isthmus of Panama, appear likely to involve that country in civil strife. The Colombian Government is anxious that the treaty with us should be ratified, but persons who know the temper of the Colombian Congress predict that it will be defeated. They predict, also, that if this should occur, the States of Panama and Cauca, which occupy the Isthmus of Panama, will secede, and organize an independent republic. In these two States, sentiment in favor of the canal is almost unanimous. The Colombian Congress has been summoned to meet in special session to consider the treaty. Should the agreement fail of ratification, it will be necessary for Panama and Cauca to act quickly in carrying out the reported plan of secession, as otherwise President Roosevelt, under the authority given him by Congress, will probably begin negotiations with Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the right to construct a canal through those countries. Panama and Cauca appear to realize that it would be better to separate from the other seven States rather than, by holding with them, to lose the advantage to the country that would accrue to it by the construction of the canal. It is much to be wished that a similar course was taken by young people who are in danger, through their association with Godless companions, of losing the benefit offered to them through Christ.

Wherefore come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Lord (II. Cor. 6: 17).

A Settlement Cancelled

A singular action has just been decided by a Justice of the Supreme Court in Fulton County, N. Y. It came before the court on an appeal from a wealthy citizen, who desired to cancel deeds he had given settling certain property on his wife. The two were living apart when the deeds were signed by the husband, but he stated in his complaint that he gave her the property on the explicit understanding that she should return to him, and should live with him until death parted them. As she had not done so, she had not, the husband contended, fulfilled the condition on which the property was given, and therefore the deeds conveying it to her should be cancelled. The Justice took that view of the case. In giving his decision, he said that the law would not uphold or tolerate agreements for the purpose of maintaining a separation between husband and wife, except in cases in which such separation was necessary, and the husband provided his wife a proper maintenance. But when he was willing and anxious to have her society, she must either consent to give it, or forfeit the husband's provision. Unhappily, there are many people who need the same warning in their religious life. They do not realize that the gifts and joys which Christ bestows on his people are made for those who live in communion with him.

If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered (John 15: 6).

Did Not Know its Value

The managers of a Young Men's Christian Association in England have just discovered that they have missed an excellent opportunity to add to the funds of the institution. For several years they have had a large picture on the walls of the Association building. It was lent to them by a friend of the Institution, who had no room in his own home suitable for it. About a year ago he suggested that they buy the picture, and told them they might have it for fifty dollars. They declined his offer, and then he reduced the price to twenty-five dollars, but they would not give so much as that for it. Since then the owner died, and his executors took the picture when they realized his estate. They sent it to a picture-mart in London, where it was at once recognized as the work of a famous master. Thirty-five thousand dollars was bid for it, and that offer has since been raised to fifty thousand. The men who refused to give twenty-five dollars for it must feel deeply chagrined. How many people there will be at the last who will realize that the offer of salvation which is now made to them free, and which they reject, is worth more than the whole world!

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul (Mark 8: 36)?

BRIEF NOTES

The wheat crop of India this year, according to official estimates, will be the largest ever known. This compensation comes for the years of famine.

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Jonathan Edwards occurs October 5. Andover Theological Seminary is making preparations for a celebration of the anniversary.

The deaths from the bubonic plague in India are increasing in number. In 1902 there were 56,000. Last year there were 109,000, and during the first three months of this year the number mounted to 331,000.

A great evangelistic campaign is being carried on in Immanuel, Ind. The work is being led by Rev. M. C. H. Lyon, of Wooster, O., whose addresses are held in tents accommodating thousands per week. Mr. H. J. Lyon, a colleague, has charge of the music. Large crowds are in attendance.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union Convention in session at Geneva, was called to order under the Presidency of Mrs. Lida M. N. Stevens, of Portland, Me., in the absence of Mary Henry Somerset, who is temporarily excused from the Presidency, ostensibly under the plea of ill-health. The American delegation numbers sixty.

It is now believed that Princeton Theological Seminary will receive over two million dollars as residuary legatee of the estates of Mrs. Mary Winthrop. When the bequest was first announced it was supposed that it would not amount to more than half a million, but the inventory shows that the deceased lady was more wealthy than her friends knew.

Evangelist G. W. McPherson has opened a General Lent Work in Lynn, and around New York between Peekskill and Haverstraw on the latter's whose Evangelist Heath is conducting a special service. Mr. McPherson has the reputation of being one of the leading preachers and one of the most eminent workers in England and America. He has been holding the meetings in Lynn at 3.15 this morning, and on Sunday last at the Lyric Rink. Mr. McPherson D.D. [illegible] evangelistic [illegible] sermon. Our Household Circle

A CHERRY PIE

SPRING lamb, green peas, and cherry pie! That's a dinner fit for a king. Don't you think we might ask the minister to come in after church, and invite Reuben's folks to spend the day?"

Deacon Otis was standing in the kitchen door. His wife was bustling about intent on her household affairs. She was a little, black-eyed woman, alert and quick, rather bird-like in her motions, a snap in her crisp accents.

"Reub's folks, of course, Leander," she said. "They always lot on eatin' Fourth of July dinner here. About Mr. Wasson, I dunno! It depends on Mamie. She may not want to seem so particular."

"Here she comes! I'll ascertain her views," said the deacon, turning ponderously round.

"Mary Otis, have you any decided objection to my having the pastor here for dinner next Thursday. It'll be Independence Day, you know."

"Now, Mame," her mother put in, "you speak your mind. I calculate to have a good dinner, and I'd as lief as not entertain Mr. Wasson and have it over with. But you've been holding off from so much as lookin' at the minister lately. You've been downright unmannerly. And if you don't want him, just say so."

"Why, mother!" Mary blushed and dimpled. Her hands were full of roses. She resembled a rose herself. "Why, mother! Why, father! What a fuss about nothing. I'd be delighted to have Mr. Wasson, if you want him. I've not been thinking of him one way or the other. I'd like to have David Treat asked too."

At the mention of David Treat's name Deacon Otis frowned. His face grew black. Mrs. Otis shook a warning finger at Mary. But the petted daughter would not be hushed.

"I think just as much of David Treat as I do of David Wasson, there! And I'll marry the one that asks me first. Mother, you'd better let the boys gather the cherries, if you want cherry pie day after to-morrow."

Singing like a thrush, Mary flitted away to her own chamber, where she was heard moving about with her light step, just as though she had not discharged a bomb-shell on the floor below.

"If she were ten instead of twenty, I'd give her a scolding she'd remember," said Mrs. Otis, angrily.

"I've a mind, as it is," replied the deacon, "to turn the key on her and lock her in her room till she comes to her senses. David Treat, indeed! The saucy jade!"

Deacon Otis was one of the slow-tempered men who take long to kindle to wrath, and who are long in cooling. As his wife saw the deepening wrath in his grim countenance, she deemed it prudent to restrain the light flame of her own anger. She was really more exasperated at Mamie's attitude to her father than at her affront to the minister, whose marked attentions to their child were flattering to both parents. There was nothing personally against David Treat. But the Treats and the Otises were ancient enemies, and from father to son had descended a feud over a disputed boundary-line. A certain cherry tree growing in the south orchard was claimed by both families, and there was an annual strife as to which should possess its rich yield of shining fruit. Until the present generation coming along had shown a singular tendency to friendliness, the stubborn farmers had taken a strange satisfaction in their inherited ill-feeling. But David and Mary had been fellow-students in a co-educational college, and had established amicable relations there, which they seemed resolved to maintain, notwithstanding the opposition of the elders on both sides.

To complicate affairs, the Reverend David Wasson had been unusually impressed by the winsome charm in Mary Otis, and had shown in numberless small ways his wish to be more to her than a mere acquaintance. He was a fine, presentable man of thirty, with some private means, and, to Mr. and Mrs. Otis, it was most irritating that their daughter should refuse so good a match. Yet this could be borne with patience, if it were not for their well-grounded suspicion that her heart was already given to David Treat.

"Husband," said Mrs. Otis, soothingly, "there's no wit in our going on so over Mary's moods. She's our only child, and you know and I know that she'll mate with nobody but the man she chooses. You heard her declaration of independence just now!"

"So did you!"

"Yes, and it pleases me no more than it pleases you. We've spoiled that child, dear, between us."

"Well, I do hope Mr. Wasson 'll have the gumption to ask her first!"

"We must give him every chance. David Treat shan't break bread at our table, any way."

"No, indeed. Not he."

The hours slipped by very swiftly. Came the morning of the Fourth. In that quiet rural community, where there was no village to speak of, nothing except the church and the post-office and the one country store at the centre, and farms stretching away in long green lines across the undulating hills and vales, the Fourth brought stir and splendor all its own. Garlands of flowers enwreathed the portico of the church, intertwined with strips of red, white and blue bunting. The flag streamed from the church roof, and from the store and post-office. Drums beat early in the morning, and a few old men, the remnant of a gallant company who years and years ago, young and brave, had marched to the Civil War, wearing their uniforms and their G.A.R. buttons and badges, met in the little square before the dew had dried.

Later there was an assemblage of the Sunday School, and the church was opened for patriotic songs and addresses. The distant muffled thunder of cannon was heard at intervals, and every small boy in the neighborhood had his own store of crackers and torpedoes. The day was like no other in the whole round year.

Duly invited, the minister and Reuben's folks came to dine at Deacon Otis' hospitable board. A fine dinner it was, well-cooked, well-served and abundant. Mary Otis, in her white frock, with her red-gold curls rippling and waving over her head, her brown eyes dancing, her dimples flashing, was quite beautiful enough to turn the head of any bachelor so fortunate as to be near her. She was a radiant vision of delight. Her parents had overcome their momentary anger with her, anger towards their idol was generally transient, and all was serene. Reuben's motherly spouse, whose children were as yet in the kindergarten and primary sphere of existence, was as proud of her niece as if she had been her daughter. Mr. Wasson was the guest of honor. David Treat was certainly nowhere to be seen.

Dinner progressed famously from asparagus soup to cherry pie, with the courses between as appetizing as ever courses could be. The minister did full justice to the delicious fare.

When the last of Mr. Wasson's bright stories had been told, and the two older men had finished their often-repeated reminiscences of other Fourths, and the cherry pie had been eaten to the last crumb, there remained of the solemn rite only the final duty of washing the dishes. The matrons took this upon themselves. Deacon Otis and Uncle Reub lit the pipes of peace and sat down in the porch to smoke. The minister disapproved of smoking, but condoned it in men so old as his host and his host's brother. He invited Mary to walk with him down the garden and toward the brook, and she consented. A nameless air of homage pervaded the young man as he strolled beside the maiden. His mind was made up. He meant down by the brook-side, under a branching elm, to ask her to marry him. On her part, divining the tokens of his decision, she was striving to fend off the honor. She did not want to reject him and inflict a pang of mortification where she really wished to be kind. Moreover, she was a girl of literal truthfulness, and she had declared she would say yes to the one of the two Davids who should first propose to her.

They sauntered slowly across the level pasture land, through the south orchard, past the fateful cherry tree. At the instant of passing it, Susie Treat, David's youngest sister, came flying out as if from an ambuscade, and presented Mary with a cherry pie and a silver knife.

"Brother says cut the pie the minute you get it, Mame!" exclaimed the breathless little messenger.

"A most inopportune gift!" began the minister. But Mary did not heed him. The silver knife was in her hand. She slipped it under the flaking crust, that covered a ruby store of uncooked cherries and a note from her lover.

"Sweetheart, my sweetheart," it ran, "you are mine and only mine. Will you marry me? Oh, Mary Otis, do not refuse; do not let anyone persuade you to make me wretched for life. Mary, if you will be my wife, send back this pie."

With great presence of mind, Mary called Susie.

"Here, dear, carry this pie back to Dave, and tell him I'll expect him over this evening."

So ended the feud of the Treats and the Otises, and the Reverend Mr. Wasson found another mate.

"HEAR ME SING 'STAR-SPANGLED BANNER!'"

OH, MOTHER-LAND!

OH, Mother-Land, we love thee,
Around thy knees we cling;
And of thy grace, in many a place,
Thy happy children sing!

Thy banner floating o'er us,
In hues of heaven's own light,
In all our coasts shall marshal hosts
For liberty and right.

From fort and fleet outstreaming
That flag of thine shall be,
Oh, Mother-Land, o'er every strand,
The symbol of the free!

Oh, Mother-Land, God bless thee!
God guard thee evermore,
From pine to palm, in storm or calm,
From ocean shore to shore.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV., CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "In His Steps."

CHAPTER I.

For narrow is the gate and straitened the way that leadeth unto life, and few be they that find it. Jesus Christ.

THE president of Lincoln College was closing his Baccalaureate sermon, and had reached that part of it where he paused, and then said impressively: "Young ladies and gentlemen of the graduating class—"

The members of the class all arose but one, a young man sitting at the end of the pew. The president waited. The young man did not move, and the girl who had been sitting beside him glanced down at him, with a slight increase of color in her face and an amused look in her eyes. But he still sat there, to all appearance unmindful of the fact that the entire audience was directing its attention upon him, wondering at the delay. The president still waited. His usually stern face was relieved by a look of humor that showed its appreciation of the situation. "Young ladies and gentlemen of the graduating class," he repeated the words, and then waited again.

But the young man did not stir, and the girl who had been sitting by him reached out her hand, and touched him gently on the shoulder.

He gave a sudden start, and his face flowed a fiery red as he stood up, while a utter went over the audience, and the president bit his lips before going on with his remarks to the class.

When the service was over the young man had not recovered from his confusion.

"You were in one of your brown studies, weren't you?" the girl spoke to him as they stood near the end of the pew, waiting for the crowd to go down the aisle.

"It was not only 'brown,' it was overdone," said another classmate, a young man standing next to the girl.

"No one would ever charge you with absent-mindedness," the girl remarked with a smile.

"No, I need all the mind I've got, on hand. I can't afford to let any of it be absent," the young man said, laughing. 'But Douglas has plenty to spare."

"I was absent with all of mine this morning," said Douglas, blushing again. 'If Miss Harris had not helped me out I might be sitting down yet."

"What were you thinking of?" asked the girl, with earnest curiosity.

"I was thinking," began the young man slowly, when he was interrupted by the president, who had just come down from the pulpit.

"Excuse me, Douglas, but can you call at the house some time this afternoon? I would like to have a little talk with you."

"Yes, sir, thank you," Douglas replied, and the president bowed in his courtly manner and passed down the aisle.

"Wonder what he wants?" the young man said in a low tone.

"Probably wants to know what you were thinking about when you sat there," said the girl.

"I was simply wondering what I was going to do, now that I am a finished college product," said Douglas, with a slight smile, as he looked frankly at Miss Harris. "Don't you feel as if the world was a cold, cold place?"

"I don't feel that way," said the girl, with a bright smile; "haven't you heard of my good fortune? I have a school to teach."

"No, I haven't heard. Where?"

"Colby High School. I received notice of my appointment last night."

"Colby? Where's that?"

"Anderson county. It's a county high school. One of the best in standard. Congratulate me."

"Certainly. Wish I was as sure of something. I am ready to walk into any kind of an opening, as the blind horse said to the cellar. Do you know of any other openings in Colby?"

"No, I don't," said Miss Harris, looking half amused and half seriously at her classmate. "If I hear of anything—"

"If you do, write and let me know, won't you?" Douglas spoke with some hesitation and did not look at the girl.

"Thank you. That is one of the best compliments my preaching ever received." The president spoke earnestly, and Doug. has looked pleased.

"I don't know that I am quite ready to go through the narrow gate, sir, but I think I would like to do some kind of work that's worth doing. What you said about the entrance to real life made me want to amount to something."

The president was an unemotional man, but that did not mean an absence of feeling. He looked at the young man now with marks of deep interest, that grew as the talk went on.

"It might almost as well be a million dollars, sir," said Douglas

They were going out into the aisle, as the crowd had passed along.

"I don't expect to have much time to write letters. Schoolma'ams in high schools don't have much leisure," she said with a hesitation that was like his. He did not have opportunity to say any more, as some one came along and shook hands with Miss Harris, and he turned to greet some of his friends, who rallied him on the incident of his absent-mindedness.

In the afternoon he went over to the president's house, and was ushered into his study. President Gray greeted him kindly, and began by asking him a question.

"What do you expect to do, Douglas?"

"I don't know, sir. I wish some one would tell me."

"Was that what you were thinking about this morning?"

Douglas colored deeply.

"Yes, sir, your sermon set me to thinking, and I forgot where I was."

"You have been here now seven years?"

"Yes, sir: I entered the academy in 1896."

"The last three years of your college course you have been editor-in-chief of the College Bulletin?"

"Yes, sir, and I have had a lot of experience on a small salary."

The president smiled slightly.

"I believe you have had some experience in the college printing department."

"A little."

"How much?"

"Well, sir, I can set type fairly well, make up the forms, run the press and holler for copy when I'm out of ideas."

"That is a good deal," the president laughed. "Have you ever thought of journalism for a life work?"

"No, sir."

"Why not?"

Douglas hesitated. "I have never thought I had any particular gift for it."

"Have you thought of going into any of the professions?"

"No, sir."

"Would you enter journalism if an opportunity were offered, especially if you had to enter the narrow gate to do the work?"

Douglas looked at the president in surprise. Then he said slowly:

"Yes, sir, I think so, if I thought I was fitted for it. But real journalism isn't like the college kind. I don't have any foolish notions about that. But do you think I could——"

The president got up and walked across the room to the window that opened on the college campus and looked out. Then he came back and stood by the young man, laying a hand on his shoulder. Douglas could not remember ever having seen him do that to any one before.

"How old are you, Douglas?"

"Twenty-five next September."

"I was twenty-seven when I graduated. You are young yet. You have a good constitution." He looked at the broad shoulders and the clear, resolute face, and after a moment's silence went back to his chair by the desk. His next question surprised the young man more than any other he had asked.

"Do you know where Colby is?"

"Colby?"

"Colby, Anderson county."

"No sir. I don't know the place. I never heard of it until this morning."

"This morning? Did I mention it in my sermon?"

"No, sir." Douglas colored slightly. "Miss Harris is going there to teach in the high school. She told me so after the service."

"She is a fine girl. She will make a good teacher. Colby is fortunate. I am glad to hear of her appointment. Well, Colby is a town of about seventeen hundred people. It has fifteen churches, ten saloons, and a county paper. The paper is for sale. Now, Douglas, I am going to be frank with you. If you will go in there, and take the paper, I believe you could enter a career of great usefulness in that part of the State. If you do as I would like to see you do, you will have to go in through the narrow gate, but you will find life by doing it, and give life to others."

Douglas looked at the president in astonishment.

"I don't know enough."

"If you thought you did, you wouldn't."

Douglas hesitated, then the frank look on the president's face encouraged him.

"But I haven't the money to buy the paper."

"It's not a million dollar daily," the president said, with a smile. "I don't know exactly the terms on which the paper can be bought, but a business friend of mine in Colby wrote me he thought the paper could be purchased for fifteen hundred dollars."

"It might almost as well be a million dollars, sir, as far as I am concerned."

The president looked at him thoughtfully.

"You're not in debt?"

"No, sir. I have saved up a little."

"How much?"

"After I've sold out my share in the college book store, I'll have about five hundred dollars in cash."

"It pays to be a little absent-minded, young man," said the president, with a twinkle of the eye. "How did you manage so well? I was nearly that much in debt when I graduated."

"Well, sir, I began saving a little when I entered the Academy. I never lived much for society or the [illegible]. I boarded myself on one dollar a week, while I was clearing four [illegible] on night school. For the last three summers I've done canvassing during vacation and made a little over expenses. The book-store business has been unusually good this last year."

"Five hundred dollars," the president mused. "Add another five hundred to it and that will make a thousand. You have a thousand dollars toward the paper already."

"A thousand dollars?"

"I don't very often anticipate the announcements of the board of trustees, but I will this time." The president spoke quietly, while Douglas' face grew more earnest and his gray eyes glowed "On commencement day the Carpenter bequest of $500 will be announced as going to Mr. Frank Douglas of the graduating class. This bequest is not conditioned as to its use, except that it shall be spent either in a year's study abroad or in some special reform work at home. The terms are in detail so defined that your use of the paper to further the work of reform in Colby will fully comply with the intention of the bequest. Indeed, I may add that another five hundred will in all probability be added to the amount by Mr. Carpenter, if he is fully satisfied that the paper will be used as it ought to be. If he does not see the way clear to help you to the amount, which may be regarded as a loan, I will see to it that the paper is purchased on good terms for you."

Douglas sat looking at the quiet figure of the president in some amazement. How was he to know that the stern-faced, apparently rather cold, unemotional man, who had been at the head of Lincoln College for twenty years, had in that period helped at least one student out of each graduating class into a special place of usefulness by just the same process of personal contact and brotherhood as Douglas was experiencing this Sunday afternoon. His whole impression of the president had to be made all over new. In half an hour he had been obliged to wipe out a seven years' portrait and paint in another.

"Do you think I can manage such a paper, sir?" He was grateful for the president's offer, and he glowed with some pride at the thought that the Carpenter bequest was his own, but his immediate feeling was one of question concerning the paper and its management.

"It is a county paper. It has been poorly managed for several years. The State campaign is on this fall, and the business men of the leading party are disgusted with the shiftless, colorless policy of the three or four men who had owned the paper. From my observation of your management of the College Bulletin I have faith in you Douglas, to believe you can make a strong, positive, good-for-something paper out of the Colby Beacon. If I did not believe so I would not be having this talk with you."

"How large a circulation has the paper?"

"Only between six and seven hundred. It has fallen down to a ridiculous figure. You ought to bring it up to three or four thousand. Colby is a county seat. The farming districts are practically not reached, to say nothing of the town itself. These facts come to me from a business friend in Colby. His name is Edwards. Put it down for reference. He is one of the leading dry goods merchants in Colby, and one of God's noblemen. If you don't find any one else there to stand by you, you can count on him."

"You are taking for granted that I am going, sir?"

"Yes; well, are you, that is, if the conditions as to the purchase of the paper can be met?"

Douglas sat a moment looking down. Then he lifted up his eyes to the president's face and said, quietly, "Yes sir, I'll go, if I can meet the conditions."

It was only a sentence and it was spoken quietly; but it marked a very important part of the history of Frank Douglas, graduate of Lincoln College, in the year 1872.

After a moment of silence the president spoke, and Douglas was much moved to hear the voice tremble a little.

"This decision will mean a great deal to you, Douglas, and to the people of Colby, if you direct the paper as I believe you will. I don't want to outline your policy for you, and, indeed, no one can do that, but I am going to ask you one question. You will have to meet it at the start. The saloon in Colby. I take it for granted you will use your paper to remove that curse to the town and county."

"You don't forget my father's history, sir?" Douglas replied, while the hot blood rose to his forehead.

"Pardon me, my boy, I need not have asked the question."

"Yes, sir, that's all right. You need have no fear in that direction. When my brother died, my father was just recovering from a drunken debauch. I was only ten years old at the time, but it burned into me forever. If fighting the saloon in Colby is going to wreck the paper, I'm ready to enter by that narrow gate."

"It won't wreck the paper. But you will have need of all your courage and wisdom."

"I expect to make a lot of mistakes, sir."

"Don't be worried about that. Learn all you can out of them and then forget them. That's all that mistakes are good for."

And then the president, again to the astonishment of Douglas, said very thoughtfully, "We ought to pray over this, Douglas. You are going into a work that will call for an unusual amount of wisdom and endurance and consecrated common sense. You will need all the help you can get from God."

Seated there in the study that June afternoon, President Gray offered a prayer that almost changed the habits of thought that had characterized George Douglas for the last two years of his college course.

"A fine scheme, young man," said the Mayor, with a sneer

He had been a dreamer. Not an aimless or foolish dreamer, but his abstraction had not had any strong, definite purpose behind it. He was an average scholar and more than an average thinker. The president knew young men with a deep and wise knowledge. He had studied Douglas quietly but constantly. He was a rare nature that would crystallize certain unformed convictions under pressure, and apparently solidify character with a rapidity that previous habits had seemed to declare incapable of earnest, practical, living force.

So George Douglas, sitting there listening to that prayer from the president, whom he had deeply respected but had never until this moment known, felt a stirring of life forces in him rising surely to its vision of accomplishment in the world. He was a member of a church and had always called himself a Christian. His present experience was a larger opening of a larger life, and even as he listened, and the prayer helped him, he had some real fore-gleam of the fact that the work he had chosen to enter would necessitate his entrance through a narrow gate. A large life afterward, but a narrow gate to go through before he realized it.

"God bless you, my brother," said the president, as Douglas thanked him. "You have a great opportunity. Let God make the most of it with you."

With that wish sounding in his heart he found himself, six weeks later, in Colby, in charge of the Colby Beacon, as proprietor and editor. The terms of purchase had been satisfactorily met, thanks to Mr. Carpenter, who had taken an unusual interest in the whole affair. Douglas knew the president was at the bottom of all that. After the details of the transfer were all agreed upon, he found himself in possession of a subscription list of six hundred and fifty-nine names, four hundred and eighty of which were paid-up, and the rest delinquent anywhere from one to ten years; a press that had required all his skill to clean and repair into any kind of working order, together with the type, furniture and miscellaneous belongings of the office from which the paper had been issued, in various degrees of shiftlessness, by its different proprietors.

It was the latter part of July, and the heat of midsummer was over the land; but he resolutely set to work to clean up the office, which, to all appearance, had never been troubled with broom or dust-cloth since it was first occupied.

He was down on his knees, after the dirt behind one end of the press, when he heard some one come into the office.

"Sorry to disturb you, Mr. Douglas, but I was going by and thought I would just look in and introduce myself. I've just returned from New York. Heard from President Gray of your coming. Glad to see you."

It was a pleasant voice, and Douglas was helped by it as he got up on his feet and shook hands with the visitor.

"My name's Edwards. My store is in the block here. Success to you. I see you're beginning all right. Going to give us a clean paper anyhow, eh? That's more than we've been getting last few years."

"Yes, sir; I hope it will have that merit anyway," Douglas replied modestly. Edwards was a well dressed, alert-looking man of about fifty years of age. Douglas knew at once that Edwards would be his friend.

"When you get ready come around and let me fix up an attractive ad. for you. I'd like to consult you about it. Think we can get out something better than common."

"Thank you, Mr. Edwards. I appreciate that. If all the business men solicit ads. like that it will embarrass me."

"You won't be embarrassed very deeply," replied Edwards dryly. "But come when you are ready. Mrs. Edwards will be glad to have you call. Where are you stopping?"

"I'm boarding and rooming at M Wycoff's."

"Pretty good place?"

"I haven't been there very long; only came a week ago."

"Well, we'll have you up to dinner so Don't get dyspepsia at the Wycoff's."

"I'll try not to," Douglas laughed, Edwards abruptly went out.

He cleaned up the office desk and th attacked the windows. After he h cleared away a pile of rubbish that h accumulated under the typeholders a the paper trimmer he came back to t desk, and sat down to make a general ventory of his possessions and a survey the situation.

His entire office force consisted of t persons besides himself. There was young man to set type and run the pre who had been connected with the pap under its last management, and a boy do general work, run errands, and get the way when there was nothing else do. These two members of the staff we out while Douglas was cleaning up, b he expected them in any moment with piece of casting which was needed for t trimmer, and for which they had gone the railway station.

Sitting at the desk, the new editor a proprietor of the Colby Beacon drew piece of paper towards him, and put dow in visible form what he had been goi over in his thought every day since th Sunday afternoon talk with the presiden

The Policy of the Colby Beacon

1. I will try to get out a paper that w be of real value to all the people of th county.

2. I will advocate every good measu for the benefit of the town, and try t create a healthy pride in the physical we fare of the place.

3. I will offer the churches large spac for announcements of their work, and er phasize the value of the religious life fo the business interests of the town.

4. I will announce in my first issue tha it is the fixed principle of the paper t fight the saloon out of existence as thing of evil. The paper will not adv cate any policy of dealing with the saloo except the policy of no saloon.

5. The paper will be independent i politics and will always be for the bes man regardless of his particular party It will advocate reciprocity in trade rel tions with other countries, the advisabilit of public ownership of public utilities and the adoption of the single tax and th referendum, when these subjects are di cussed. But it is probable that the pape will be far more occupied with the loca needs of the county and town than with discussion of these national issues.

6. The editor will welcome frank an good natured correspondence, and wi always be willing to publish honest differ ences of opinion on topics of genera value and interest. He does not expec to please everybody or have everybod agree with him. But he is honestly de sirous of giving the people of Colby an the county a clean, courteous newspaper that shall represent the best interests o the people.

7. Those who want this kind of a pape can get it for one dollar a year, payable i advance. The editor is not a millionaire He is in need of the money, and if thos who are in arrears for the last ten year will pay up, he will not publish thei names unless they request it as a specia favor.

8. The editor asks for a fair hearing and can only promise to do his best. He will make mistakes, but will always be ready to acknowledge them. He naturally hopes that the business men will help sup port the paper with advertising, which will be made as attractive and readable as possible.

He had paused as if he had reached the end of his proposed statements when he heard voices and steps and looked up. Three men came in.

The man in advance of the others, an unusually large man, was perspiring very freely, and mopped his face as he took off his hat and looked at Douglas keenly.

"I'm Mayor Bartlett," he said, as Douglas stood at the desk. "These are friends of mine, citizens of Colby. Mr. Trask and Mr. Reed, Mr. Douglas. We were going by and thought we would step in and see the new editor. Just got back from the county convention. Didn't know ary was going to sell out the Beacon soon. Hasn't been exactly a gold ine, I guess."

Mayor Bartlett looked keenly at Doug- all the time he was talking. When he through, he put the cigar he had been fling between his fingers into his mouth d began smoking vigorously. His two nds followed his example.

"Won't you be seated, gentlemen?" uglas said quietly. "I have just been aming house, and things are not all ightened out, but I hope to have them rder soon."

The visitors sat down, and the Mayor ned himself vigorously.

"It's a hot day."

"Yes, sir," said Douglas.

The Mayor seemed to be sizing up the w editor, and was apparently not very ll satisfied with his judgment of him.

"You've bought the paper outright, I derstand, Mr. Douglas."

"Yes, sir."

"Might I ask, if it isn't too bold, what had to give?"

Douglas told him.

"Too much," said the Mayor.

"Altogether," asserted Mr. Trask.

"The concern isn't worth a thousand," ded Mr. Reed.

Douglas did not say anything; but he ked surprised.

"You'll give us a good paper, Mr. Doug- ?" asked the Mayor.

"As good as I know how."

"How good is that?"

"You will have to judge of that after seeing it."

"I mean what's your policy? Your poli- tics?" the Mayor spoke blandly; and, for the first time, Douglas could not help noticing the man's tone. It had an air of proprietorship about it that affected the young editor very disagreeably.

The sheets of paper containing his out- line of proposed policy of the paper lay under his hand. He gathered them up, and suddenly leaning forward, handed them out to the Mayor.

"I have just been outlining the policy of the Beacon. You are at liberty to read that, if you wish."

The Mayor put his hat on the back of his head, shifted his cigar to the other corner of his mouth and took the sheets of paper that Douglas handed him.

He read in silence. But Douglas watched him and saw his face grow dark. When he finished, he looked up at Doug- las and said with a sneer:

"A fine scheme, young man! Why, do you know you've tackled enough to bring in the millennium! You never can make that go here in Colby. Advertising! Who'll advertise in such a Sunday School sheet?"

Douglas colored to his hair. The other two men were eying him between the clouds of tobacco smoke.

"Mr. Edwards will, for one."

"Edwards! Yes, and he'll be the one. Precious little advertising you'll get after the first issue. Why, young man, your politics ruin the paper to start with. It's going to be independent and run the se- lects out, and hit up the standard gener- ally," the Mayor turned to his friends. "But it won't do, Mr. Douglas." The Mayor assumed a confidential manner. Douglas quietly watched him. "You do not understand the local conditions. Why, you will simply commit suicide if you fol- low out the policy you have outlined there. You can't pay for the printer's ink in four weeks time."

"I think I can," Douglas said mildly. The Mayor did not understand him. He looked at the young man in silence for a moment.

"To tell the truth, Mr. Douglas, we came in here to make you a proposition to sell out. Fact is, I was on the point of making Cleary an offer, when those county conventions came on, and I've not had time to see to it. Cleary got anxious and let the paper go. But you never can suc- ceed with the paper. I'm giving you my honest opinion. Am I right?" he turned to the other men.

"Gospel truth," said Mr. Trask, spitting into the waste-paper basket.

"That's right," added Mr. Reed.

"Now we're ready to make a fair offer, Mr. Douglas. You've had the trouble of coming here and all that. We realize you've just got into possession and cleaned up and so on, but you've had no newspaper ex- perience to speak of, and you are bound to fail on the ground you have mapped out. You don't know the political situ- ation here, and we do. I mean, we want the Beacon to keep out the county ticket fall. I'll make no secret of that. And we stand ready to offer $4,000 for the entire plant as it stands. That covers your claims for your outlay and so forth, of course. I realize that you must take an advantageous move than the paper is worth, but you understand we hope to increase the subscription list largely during the campaign."

Douglas had listened with his eyes on the sheet of paper which contained the outlines of his proposed policy. When the Mayor stopped, he lifted his eyes and looked steadily into his visitor's face.

"I don't care to sell," he said slowly.

"I know it's a trouble to get started and then leave."

"But I not only don't care to sell, Mr. Bartlett, I won't sell," said Douglas, slow- er than before.

The Mayor stopped fanning himself, and the dark look on his face deepened, as he looked at the editor and proprietor of the Colby Beacon. It was not possible for him to know the fact, but the way had become suddenly very straitened to the young editor, and he was about to enter the narrow gate of life. There was a prayer in his heart as he sat there that July afternoon, that he might not prove either a coward or a weakling as the gate swung inward to his soul.

The Mohonk Conference Hopeful of the World's Arbitration Outlook

SIGNIFICANT of the growth of public senti- ment in favor of international arbitration, was the largely increased attendance at the Ninth Annual Conference on International Arbitra- tion at Lake Mohonk, this year. These Mo- honk gatherings have been made up of the leaders in American thought and action—men and women of large hearts and broad minds; t of the assemblage brought together this year, this ght be said more truly than ever before. There were esent some twenty judges and prominent jurists, irty preachers and teachers of religion, nearly all of tional reputation, forty-two educational leaders, in- ding five presidents of colleges, over twenty-five itors of magazines and newspapers, and about fifty aptains of industry," financiers, manufacturers and en of large affairs.

The Conference had an ideal presiding officer in the rson of the Hon. John W. Foster, diplomat, states- an and peace commissioner. In his opening address, r. Foster said that to believers in arbitration, the ost edifying and auspicious event had come from a arter of the world to which Anglo-Saxons had not en inclined to look—Chili and Argentina. A contro- rsy over a boundary line had threatened to plunge these peoples into sanguinary conflict: but better coun- sels prevailed, and they settled their differences by arbi- tration. Referring to the Venezuelan imbroglio, Mr. Foster said it had served to bring into prominence the value of arbitration and the utility of The Hague Tribu- nal.

Dr. B. F. Trueblood, of Boston, secretary of the American Peace Society, said that within the past year these controversies have been referred to arbitration:

Between Italy and Guatemala, as to the treatment of Italian emigrants; Claims of citizens of France against Venezuela; United States and San Domingo, over the San Domingo Improvement Company's claims; Great Britain and Portugal, on colonial boundaries in South Africa; Alaska boundary dispute between the United States and Great Britain; Bound- ary dispute between Chili and Argentina; Controversy be- tween the United States and Russia over seizure of American sealing vessels in Behring Sea; Samoan Claims question between the United States, Great Britain and Germany, and citizens of these countries; Controversies between Great Britain and France; Case between the United States and Salvador.

Addresses were delivered by Dr. Henry B. F. Mac- Farland, President of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; Mr. William L. Penfield, solicitor to the State Department and counsel for the United States in the trial of the Pious Fund case at The Hague; Rev. Arthur J. Brown, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Dr. Josiah Strong, Mr. S. Uchida, Japanese Consul-General, New York, and others.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale called attention to the impor- tant effects of the Pan-American Conference at Mexico City. They point to a much closer union of all the Ameri- can peoples. A Pan-American Railway, and the popula- tion of the Valley of the Amazon, as a consequence, "will be the greatest achievement of the next century."

At the close of its deliberations, the Conference adopted resolutions, setting forth the belief that "the next step in the steady march forward should be the conclusion of a treaty of obligatory arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, to be followed by similar agreements between the other signatory nations to The Hague Convention, to refer disputes to The Hague Tribunal. The example thus set, would be speedily followed by the other Powers. It would lead all the nations to The Hague Tribunal." The Confer- ence "appeals to every man and woman to aid in in- creasing and organizing the general sentiment in favor of International Arbitration, that wars may cease and that peace may prevail."

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP*

The Biblical Injunctions to Non-Resist- ance are Not a Bar to Patriotism

WHEN the passages associated with the topic were written, there was no possibility of the Chris- ans, for whom they were written, exer- sing any influence on the government. esistance to the Roman power would ve been futile. The governors ap- inted by the Emperor might oppress e people, might govern unjustly, but ey could not be unseated by insurrec- on, nor could they be affected in their ovinces by any popular vote. The only ay, therefore, to a quiet, peaceable life, as by submission, and this course was joined on the Christians. They were to set an example of obedience to the powers appointed, and not to mix them- selves up in conspiracies and plots. Modern rulers have used these injunc- tions as if they were intended to apply to Christians in every age, and have re- proached Christian patriots for the atti- tude they have sometimes taken. King George III. could never understand our Christian forefathers raising the standard of rebellion against him, and believed that they were false to Christian principle. In the time of Charles I., James II. and William III. the preachers were at issue on the subject. But our nation would never have been independent, nor England the great nation she now is, if Washington and Cromwell had not repudiated the slavish interpretation of the apostolic commands.

In our own time, also, the injunction of non-resistance has its limitations. While obeying the law, we are justified, and indeed obligated, to take every means in our power to have unrighteous laws re- pealed: and circumstances might arise in which resistance to a Governor or a Presi- dent, who sought to violate the Constitu- tion, would be a Christian duty. The intelligent way of obeying such passages as have been associated with the topic, is not in the spirit of blind literalism, but in recognizing the duty of orderly conduct and abstaining from participation in any movement for the subversion of properly constituted authority.

Divine and Human Kingship

Saul Chosen King

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 12
I. SAMUEL 10: 17-27

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT:
THE LORD IS OUR KING; HE WILL SAVE US.—ISAIAH 33: 22.

TWO modern stories will fitly introduce this lesson about divine and human kingship. Dean Farrar, as one of the chaplains to Queen Victoria, was preaching before her on one occasion. He had made the Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ the subject of his sermon. The Queen was always a most attentive listener, but on this occasion she was specially interested, and, when her chaplain and herself were together afterwards, she spoke about the subject he had chosen. "Oh, how I wish," she said, "that the Lord might come during my lifetime!" Dean Farrar was a little astonished to hear such a desire so fervently expressed by one who had everything the world could give. "Why," asked the preacher, "does your Majesty feel this very earnest desire?" He saw that the Queen's lips were quivering, and that her face was lighted up with deep emotion. "I should so like to lay my crown at his feet," she replied, after a moment's pause.

When the late Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, was expressing, in the prospect of death, some concern about the state of his soul, his physician endeavored to soothe his mind by referring to his high respectability, and his honorable conduct in the distinguished situation in which Providence had placed him, when he stopped him short, saying, "No; remember, if I am to be saved, it is not as a prince, but as a sinner." All mankind, high and low, in the sight of God are sinners and subjects. While wilfully persisting in sin we are rebels; becoming loyal only when we repent and turn.

In this light, let us recall the story of King Saul's coronation. We may well dramatize it, like one of Shakespeare's historic plays. The place is Mizpeh; the persons represented, God, Samuel, Saul, the Jewish people. The first scene includes Samuel's speech to the gathered people, reproving them, as he had done before, for asking a visible, human king, when the invisible God has ever been their invincible King. In the second scene, the people march by tribes before this invisible King, that he may select, by a sign from heaven, the earthly king he has reluctantly allowed them. When the tribe of Benjamin is passing, the heavenly sign—perhaps a flash of light—indicates that the king is to be from that tribe. Then this tribe is divided up and passes "before the Lord" by families, and the family of Matri is taken. Then this family passed before the Lord by individuals, and the sign falls upon Saul, but in a moment he has modestly hidden from the great honor. In the third scene, Saul has been found and brought to the people, above whom he towers, tallest of all, and the people shout, "God save the king." With some further admonitions Samuel dismisses the assembly. In the fourth scene we see the new king going back to his home with a body-guard of "men whose hearts God had touched," while sons of Belial by the wayside sneer and withhold the usual gifts of tribute, to which the new king, wise at the start in self-control, makes no angry rejoinder. (Sketch Saul's whole life, before and after his coronation, down to I. Samuel 12: 13, where the next lesson begins). His good qualities included modesty and reticence, but, like Jehu and Demas, he was only half right, and so a whole failure.

It is well to fight and win—
If that may be;
It is well to fight and die therein—
For such go free.

It is ill to fight and find no grave
But a prison cell—
To keep alive, yet live a slave—
Praise those who fell!

But worst of all are those who stand
With arms laid by,
Bannerless, helpless, no command,
No battle cry.

They live to save unvalued breath,
With lowered eyes;
In place of victory, or death—
A compromise!

Illustration and Application

Some of the truths this lesson suggests are: 1. God is supreme Lord, and his law the supreme law of every individual and of every land. 2. A human king is but an image of God, and like idols likely to take the place of God in men's thoughts. 3. Only as a human officer is godlike and leads men toward God is he true to his opportunity. 4. A godly man is more kingly than an ungodly ruler. 5. All the good are to be crowned by and by as "kings and priests unto God."

What our loyalty to God should be. A book entitled The Czar, tells of a Russian officer taken prisoner by the French. They got an iron and branded him on his hand with an "N." When he asked what it meant they said, "It means that now you belong, body and soul, to our Emperor, Napoleon." The soldier, seizing an axe, severed his hand from the wrist, and said, "Take what belongs to you; I am for the Czar and belong wholly to him." Whether fact or fiction, the story pictures the entire consecration, the whole-souled loyalty that Jesus claimed for himself when he said, "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." If there be anything dear as a right hand that bears Satan's mark and binds us to him instead of Christ, that we must fearlessly cut away. Just there Saul failed when he disobeyed God rather than lose the fat cattle of the Amalekites.

Royal Trappings Hiding God. How the pomp of human royalty hides, instead of revealing God, may be illustrated by a story told of James the Second, who sat for his portrait to Varelst, the famous flower painter. When the performance was finished, his Majesty appeared in the midst of a bower of sunflowers and tulips, which completely drew away attention from the central figure, so that all who looked at it took it for a flower piece. So the Supreme King is hidden by the glitter of human monarchs, who are supposed to be only his attendants.

A Spanish artist was employed to depict the "Last Supper." He put on the table in the foreground some chased cups, the workmanship of which was exceedingly beautiful, and when his friends came to see the picture on the easel, every one said, "What beautiful cups!" "Ah!" said he, "I have made a mistake; these cups divert the eyes of the spectator from the Master," and he rubbed them from the canvas. Whatever in our lives diverts thought from God, let us cast it out, even though only a "weight" and not a "sin" (Heb. 12: 1).

Kings Who Misrepresent the King of kings. Saul, like James the First of England, and the Sixth of Scotland, was a waverer, and was aware of this defect. He heard of a preacher who was singularly happy in his choice of texts. James appointed him to preach before him, that he might put his abilities to the test. The preacher with the utmost gravity gave out his text in the following words: "James the first and sixth, in the latter part of the verse, 'for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea.'" "He is at me already!"

"SEE YE HIM WHOM THE LORD HATH CHOSEN"

said the king. No waverer can be a true king or a true Christian; but a waverer may become, as Peter did, firm as a rock, through the Spirit's indwelling.

The French king, Henry III., said to Palissy, the Huguenot potter, one day, that he should be compelled to give him up to his enemies unless he changed his religion. "You have often said to me, sire," was the undaunted reply, "that you pitied me, but as for me, I pity you, who have given utterance to such words as 'I shall be compelled.' These are unkingly words, and I say to you, in royal phrase, that neither the Guises, nor all your people, nor yourself, are able to compel an humble manufacturer of earthenware to bend his knee before statues." Palissy was more kingly than the king, even in this world, and he alone of the two had any prospect of a crown for eternity.

This is a fitting lesson in which to recall, for all who are tempted to pride of rank, or wealth, or family, the favorite poem of President Lincoln,

"O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

An Indian fakir entered an Eastern palace, and spread his bed in one of its ante-chambers, pretending that he had mistaken the building for a caravansary or inn. The prince, amused by the oddity of the circumstance, ordered the man to be brought before him, and asked him how he came to make such a mistake. "What is an inn?" the fakir asked. "A place," was the reply, "where travelers rest a little while before proceeding on their journey." "Who dwelt here before you?" again asked the fakir. "My father," was the prince's reply. "And did he remain here?" "No," was the answer; "he died and went away." "And who dwelt here before him?" "His ancestors." "And did they remain here?" "No; they also died and went away." "Then," rejoined the fakir, "I have made no mistake, for your palace is but an inn after all."

A True Representation of God. A king should come to his office in the spirit in which artists like Tissot and Dannecker have sought to image Christ. Dannecker, the German sculptor, occupied eight years upon a marble statue of Christ. When he had labored two years the work was apparently finished. He called into his studio a little girl, and, directing her attention to the statue, asked her, "Who is that?" She replied, "A great man." The artist turned away rebuked. He had failed. He began anew, and after several years had passed, he again invited a child into his studio, and repeated the inquiry, "Who is that?" This time he was not disappointed. After looking in silence for awhile, her curiosity deepened into awe and thankfulness, and, bursting into tears, she said in low and gentle tones, "Suffer little children to come unto me." He believed then, and ever afterward that he had been inspired of God to do that thing. He thought that he had seen a vision of Christ in his solitary vigils. He had but transferred to the marble the image that the Lord had shown to him. His rising fame attracted the attention of Napoleon, and he was requested to make a statue of Venus similar to Ariadne, for the gallery of the Louvre. He refused, saying, "A man who has seen Christ would commit sacrilege if he should employ his art in the carving of a pagan goddess. My art is hence forth a consecrated thing." In that spirit should every one called to any office, instead of thinking and talking of the "honor," recall the great saying, "Office is opportunity." It is "opportunity" to represent and serve God. A king who represented God, in a measure, is presented in the story of a poor woman who stood at the window of a king's conservatory looking at a cluster of grapes which she longed to have for her sick child. She went home to her spinning-wheel, earned half a dollar, and offered it to the gardener for the grapes. He waved his hand, and ordered her away. She returned to her cottage, snatched the blanket from her bed, pawned it, and once more asked the gardener to sell her the grapes, offering him a dollar. He spoke furiously to her, and was turning her out, when the princess came in, heard the man's passion, saw the woman's tears, and asked what was wrong. When the story was told she said, "My dear woman, you have made a mistake. My father is not a merchant, but a king; his business is not so sell, but to give;" so saying, she plucked the cluster from the vine and dropped it into the woman's apron. The story may well have been invented to picture salvation as something we do not earn, but receive as a free gift from the divine King.

A Lesson for Leaders

This lesson is preeminently for all who are called to lead others, whether as officers in Church or State, or as teachers or as parents, or in groups of children where some have natural leadership which should be sacredly used as "opportunity" for right influence. A gentleman had arranged a concert as a charity benefit, in which his gifted wife was to lead. She was playing the organ and leading the band of music as well as the choir boys, but in the midst of it all she became so fascinated with the fine execution of the band and so delighted with the singing of the choir boys that she ceased playing, and listened. Her husband rushed up to her, exclaiming, "Don't you know that you are leading? They are waiting for you!" In an instant her hands were on the organ and she resumed the leadership. Few of us but are leaders to somebody. Let us not forget we are leading toward or away from Christ.

Crowns for All

And now we are ready to put into this cluster of kingly stories those that remind us that God offers kingship to every man, a measure of it in this world in self-control, in social influence, in the power of knowledge, in the ballot, but a perfect kingship in the life to come. A distinguished man had an extraordinary mark of distinction and honor sent him by his prince, as he lay on his death-bed. "Alas!" said he, looking coldly upon it, "this is a fine thing here in this country; but I am going to a country where it will be of no service to me." A minister once entered an ancient almshouse, of which an aged couple were the inmates. Beside a little round table, opposite the fire, sat the husband, and, as he was very deaf, his visitor shouted in his ear, "Well, Wisby, what are you doing?" "Waiting, sir." "For what?" "For the appearing of my Lord." "And what makes you wish for his appearing?" "Because I expect great things then. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing."

Even as we write, the news comes of the dissolute King and Queen of Servia slain by their outraged subjects, and suddenly sent to answer for their sins before the King of kings—uncrowned for both worlds. From such an abuse of "opportunity" the warning comes anew to us, "Let no man take thy crown." Any hour the King may come in his glorious appearing. Would we be ready if He came to-day?

My work for the day is almost through,
Was it all as in His sight?
Would Jesus be able to say "Well done,"
Supposing He came to-night?

Lord Jesus I want more grace each day,
To help me to walk aright;
So that my heart may welcome you,
Supposing you come to-night.

Boyhood Days of Famous Divines

No I. JOSEPH PARKER

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

DR. JOSEPH PARKER declared, not long before he left the world, that one of the most vivid memories of his childhood was the solemn threat under which he and children of his grade were brought up to believe, that if they did anything wrong they should certainly be sent to "Botany Bay." That was enough to make his heart quail and to blanch his face. He knew it to be a geographical term, but it was a mystery to his young mind. There was only one word more terrible to his boyish imagination, and that was "Van Dieman's Land." He felt instinctively that it was a bad land, full of brimstone, and full of unholy suggestions. When it was reported that the grandfather of one of his boyish playmates had actually been in Van Dieman's Land, his respect for the boy was rudely and visibly modified.

Parker tells of the mingled amusement and horror with which he heard of a Methodist meeting, in which they were singing "We are Marching Through Emmanuel's Ground," and at the close of the hymn, one good old man, whose emotion was in excess of his intelligence, fervently prayed, "Grant that when this life is over, every one of us may have a cottage in 'Van Dieman's Land.'"

In his autobiography, Joseph Parker relates an interesting happening of his boyhood, which is also significant as revealing the peculiar hatred and horror of Catholics among Protestants in the England of that time. In the town of Hexam, where Parker was born and brought up, there was a Catholic priest named Michael Singleton, and the children were all warned that he was a "man of sin," and that the "little horn" of Daniel was hid somewhere about him. Joseph was constantly on the lookout for the horn. If he could have seen it, he would have run away from it, or have thrown stones at it, but it was not to be seen. This Mr. Singleton was the gentlest of men, with that gracious human smile that always wins children. One day he spoke to young Joseph Parker, and without knowing it, made an epoch in the boy's life. It gradually leaked out in the Sunday School where Joseph was a scholar, that he had been spoken to by the "man of sin," the "mystery of iniquity," and the "little horn" of Daniel. After that, some specially bitter folks looked curiously at him.

Not long after this, a mysterious old man in the community died, and on his florid tombstone, at the close of the usual facts, were engraved these letters, "R. I. P." The whole community was stirred up, as to what these letters meant. When a company were talking it over, many suggestions were made. One man said that no doubt the deceased was known by his friends to be an old Rip. Another scouted this idea, and suggested, "Rest in Paradise." Another spoke up, saying the letters must mean, "Resurrection Is Possible." Still another came to the front with the cruel interpretation, "Resurrection Im Possible." Joseph, an impertinent little schoolboy, burst forth with the solemn declaration that R. I. P. meant Requiescat in pace, when it was immediately decided that his remarks smacked of Popery, and that the touch of "the little horn" of Daniel was breaking out in the lad.

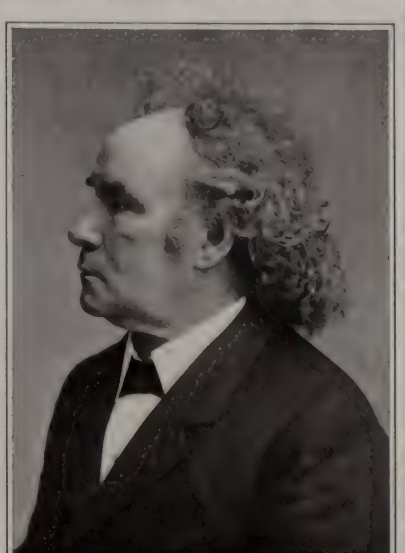
Joseph Parker's first schoolmaster was a man of violent temper. Parker says of him: "When I made the acquaintance of the infamous Mr. Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, I immediately recognized a familiar figure. Squeers is neither overdrawn nor overcolored in a single particular. My own early years were spent under the rod of a kindred tyrant. For sheer cruelty I have never known such a man. All day long he was thrashing one boy or another, and the heavier the hazel stick the better the tyrant liked it.

It was while at the school of the "Old Whacker," Joseph Parker became the champion marble player of all his little world. He declares that no one could stand before him in the matter of marbles. After he was threescore years and ten, remembering that time, he writes:

"In marbles, I was a millionaire. To this day (though all my skill is dead), I cannot see a group of boys playing at marbles without feeling a strong wish to join them."

Other and better schoolmasters followed that first cruel tyrant. Finally he came into the hands of the Rev. Joseph Walker. This gentleman was ruled with a rod of iron by his wife, who was much larger than himself. She took up his attention a good deal. Here is a little scrap of diary which throws a glimmer of light on that school:

Nov. 7. Mr. Walker has been very cloudy today all over. Wilson says that the Missus was rowing him after breakfast, because the family prayer had not been "sufficiently personal" when he knows perfectly well that Lilburne was going to leave school without paying for two plates and a flower pot he had broken. She thought the matter might have been mentioned in the prayer. . . .



THE LATE REV. JOSEPH PARKER

The poor master is quite dazed. He is not apt at reproachful prayer.

Looking back on it all in his old days, Joseph Parker thought of Walker with kindly heart, and wrote: "Good Mr. Walker! He had no cane. He threatened no life. He made no boy unhappy."

As may well be imagined from his later years, Joseph Parker was a bright boy in school. Even the cruel "Old Whacker" was accustomed to seek his assistance, young boy that he was, in some of his official duties, and would take him out on Saturday mornings to assist him in his work as a land surveyor. Joseph came to have quite a little skill in measuring land, and mapping out small estates. Though still very young in the second and third schools, he was an usher in each, receiving his remuneration partly in money and partly in instruction.

When he was fourteen, it was decided that Joseph should leave school and learn his father's trade, that of a mason. Joseph was willing to accept the situation only on the proud understanding that, in wearing his moleskins he was to serve his father only, and never be the servant of any other man. He was greatly sustained in accepting the calling of a mason by finding that Dr. Cumming's father was a mason, and Dr. Kitto's father was a mason, that Thomas Carlyle's father was a mason, that Jay of Bath, was a mason, and that Hugh Miller, the famous geologist and the brilliant editor, began life as a mason. In fact, it was made quite clear to his imaginative boyish mind, that to begin life otherwise than as a mason was to invite disgrace. But it was not destined that Joseph Parker should give his life to that sort of building. He went at it with high spirits, but says of the result: "But alas! within the year—one poor little gray year—I was ignominiously sent back to school, and thus the honest occupation of building lost its most promising ornament."

A NEW RECEIPT For Summer Breakfast

Another Corn Starch Talk

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

Starch in our diet is a valuable element, furnishing us with force and energy, and when properly prepared and well digested it is almost wholly utilized in the system. In the receipt given we have a breakfast dish combining the proteid of egg and milk, carbohydrates in the familiar form of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch and the fat of butter, while the ham furnishes salt and appetizing flavor. An attractive appearance also will be insured if the toast be cut in uniform slices and the sauce be thick and smooth. The pink tint of the sauce, the white and gold of the egg and a bit of parsley for contrast furnish a pleasing combination of color, to whet a flagging appetite.

CREAMED HAM WITH POACHED EGG.

Make a smooth white sauce with two rounding tablespoons of butter and one of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch with a cupful of milk. Season with pepper and add a cup of finely chopped cooked ham. Spread the mixture over rounds of toast, lay a carefully poached egg over each, season lightly and serve immediately, with a garnish of curly parsley.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. H. F., Lexington, Ky. I have noticed the account of the evangelistic work in New York City, in which the advertising space in street cars is being used to publish the Gospel. By this means, many will read the great truths (such as Jno. 3:16), who never enter a church. Is there no way by which this movement can be extended to other cities? And perhaps, billboards and posters used also to publish the tidings of salvation to those who will not attend church. Will you not advocate this to the thousands of Christian readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, so that the time may speedily come, when the knowledge of "the Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea."

An excellent suggestion. We shall be glad to hear from friends in other cities, who contemplate putting it into practice.

J. F. P., Wylam, Ala. Do you think that the great catastrophes to which we are sometimes subjected, such is cyclones, conflagrations, volcanic disturbances, etc., are sent as a warning from God, because of wickedness; or do they come in obedience to some law of nature?

Although all human experience and divine revelation, teach us that God punishes the wicked who do not repent and turn to him, we are not justified in assuming that visitations of the character referred to in the foregoing letter, are in any sense to be regarded as in this category. Indeed, Christ plainly rebuked such a conclusion, when he referred to the persecution of the Galileans, and the disaster at Siloam (Luke 13:1-4). Nature has her divinely adjusted laws; and the world moves in obedience to these laws. Greater wisdom would teach us not to live in localities that are obviously liable to be inundated, or overwhelmed by landslides; and to build of such material, and in such manner that risks from conflagration will be minimized. In a majority of cases, however, human foresight seems utterly powerless to provide against or to escape from such happenings, and we must be content to regard them as the result of natural law, to which the righteous and the wicked are alike subject "as the rain falleth on the just and the unjust."

M. A. B., Jamesville, N. Y. Will not some one tell me how to test the purity of well water?

Possibly some reader may be able to suggest a simple and reliable method to those who live in rural districts.

C. C. M., Homerville, O. 1. Does the Old Testament prohibition of swine's flesh still continue obligatory? 2. Are there special reasons for believing the coming of Christ near at hand?

1. The question whether Gentile Christians were required to obey the Jewish dietary and other laws, was submitted to a council of the Apostles by the Apostle Paul. Their decision was given formally in writing (see Acts 15:23-29). It explicitly freed them from such obligation, with certain exceptions, which are stated. There is, therefore, no religious reason for abstaining from swine's flesh, whatever sanitary reason there may be. 2. Students of prophecy believe that Christ's coming will be in two stages. The first, a coming into the air to summon those of his followers who are ready, to meet him, and a later stage, when he will come to the earth to reign. The former may occur at any time, and the condition of the world now is very much such as he said it would be when he would return. But it is true now, as when he spoke, that no man knoweth the day or the hour.

Recently a reader wrote us that she had probably the largest collection of CHRISTIAN HERALD premium books of any of our subscribers. The letter below, however, takes precedence of all others in this respect:

To "The Christian Herald":

I have seen it stated in THE MAIL-BAG, that Mrs. Edna C., of Manhattan, Kan., has forty books, besides Art Portfolio, Art Gallery, two Bibles and Red Letter Testament (in eighteen years). I think I can go it one better (for eight years), and not count what I bought and gave away to my Sunday School scholars. Here below you will see what I have: 1. The Pathway of Life; 2. From Manger to Throne; 3. Around the Tea Table and (9) other books in case; 4. The World-Wide Encyclopedia (15) books in set; 5. The Wedding-Ring and (9) other books in case; 6. Crumbs Swept Up and (9) other books in case; 7. Stepping-Stones to Happiness; 8. Home Life Made Beautiful; 9. Onward to Fame and Fortune; 10. Around the World with Eyes Wide Open; 11. Art of Home-Making; 12. Rulers of World at Home; 13. Best Things from American Literature; 14. Cheerful To-days and Trustful To-morrows; 15. The Speaking Oak; 16. Two Teacher's Bibles (thumb-mark); 17. Red Letter Testament (thumb-mark); 18. Red Letter Bible (thumb-mark); 19. London Art Bible; 20. Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary. And other things, as Atlas of World, Quiver Magazine, Success, Cosmopolitan, Lily of Field, Art Gallery, Olive Wood, etc., etc. There are (62) books, outside of other things not counted. FRANK P. DANNER.

A BONFIRE OF 1,300 GAMBLING MACHINES IN PHILADELPHIA

The Law and Order Society, of Philadelphia, is doing excellent work in ridding the city of certain evils particularly dangerous to the young. Its latest effective work was the destruction of hundreds of slot gambling machines, devices recently invented for petty gambling. The war against the slot machines was waged with such determination, and so strong was the public sentiment created against them, that the courts issued an order for the destruction of all such machines in use in the city. 1,300 machines were burned in one huge bonfire, in the presence of a great crowd of spectators. The mischief-making machines made a pile sixty feet long and ten feet high. The entire mass was saturated with kerosene, and matches were applied while the crowd cheered lustily. More than $1,500 were taken from the machines before they were destroyed. This money will eventually revert to the city. Rev. Hughes O. Gibbons, D.D., is President of the Society, which has been in existence about twenty years, and has made an excellent record. H. H. H.

J. B., St. Paul, Minn. Our rainmakers do not seem to succeed in drawing moisture from the clouds when it is most needed to relieve drought. Is it not a fact, however, that in some Eastern countries there are veritable rainmakers, who operate on scientific principles with success?

We would advise you to inquire of Chief Moore, of the Weather Bureau, Washington, for all data on the subject. We have heard of one form of rainmaking experiment in India. The apparatus was a rocket, containing a reservoir of ether, and rising to the height of a mile. When it began to descend slowly, under an automatic parachute, the ether was released in a spray, which lowered the surrounding temperature, condensing the vapor and producing rain, which, necessarily, was limited to a very small area.

...y M., Germantown, Pa. Apart from Jewish ... history and religious observances, has the ...number seven ever possessed any special sig...nificance?

...n almost every case the number is asso...ted with the symbolism of religion, or re...ous ceremonies. Occasionally we find it ...another form, as in the story of the Seven ...oban Heroes, the Seven Sleepers of Ephe..., etc. Pythagoras held this number to be ...e key of all numbers, and sacred. The Ara...ans had a sevenfold oath which they held ...be inviolable. The Turks have some pe...ular ceremonies, in connection with cap, ...ak and girdle, in which seven is prominent. ...Egypt, a person afflicted with sore eyes, ...uld go to seven women, of the name of ...lima, buy a morsel of bread from each, ...s these into a paste, and apply to the eye.

...Subscriber, Fairfield, Conn., writes: ...the May 6 number, Jessie M. asks for facts ...out the purchase of a slave girl by Henry Ward ...echer. ...W., Danville, Vt. What is meant by the Higher ... Criticism of the Bible?

...t is an effort to discover by careful exam...tion of the contents of the various books, ...eir date, authorship, etc. Also as to how ...ey were composed, whether compiled from ...cuments previously existing, or as original ...atter. Also whether or not they have been ...ted since they were written. Such a pas...ge, for instance, as Judges 17:6, "In those ...ys there was no king in Israel," would ...turally suggest the inference that it was ...erted in the original book at a later date, ...en there was a king in Israel. If you com...re Genesis 1:27 with Genesis 2:7, you will ...e that the account of the creation of man is ...plicated. This and similar duplications are ...ken by the Higher Critics as evidence that ...o or more documents existed, which were ...mbined in the books as we now have them. ...is only fair, however, to warn you that some ...the conclusions reached by the Higher ...itics are somewhat fanciful, and are not ...cepted by orthodox scholars.

...Student, Binghamton, N. Y. A very sim...e and effective argument of analogy is cited ... Samuel L. Phillips, in his orthodox work, ...e Testimony of Reason, issued by Neale ...blishing Co., Washington, D.C. He writes: ...f one should visit an uninhabited island, and in ...versing it, find a watch for keeping time, such ...dividual would conclude, on examining its parts, ...d noticing their dependence one on the other ...d all tending to produce a common result, that ...me intelligent being had made the watch. Now, ...innumerable evidences of design in vegetables, ...imals and mankind, show a far more complex and ...nderful mechanism than the watch, and, by ...alogy, they must have been made by an intelli...nt Creator.

...W., Wadsworth, Mass. Will you please tell me ... the names of the places, in their order, that Paul ... visited on his three missionary journeys?

Second Journey. From Antioch, north and ...est through Syria, Cilicia, Phrygia and Ga...tia to Pergamos, Adramyttium, Assos and ...roas; thence across the Ægean via Samoth...ce to Neapolis, Philippi, Amphipolis, Apol...nia, Thessalonica, Edessa, Berea, Athens, ...orinth; recrossing the Ægean to Ephesus, ...omeward by sea to Cæsarea and Jerusalem, ...d thence to Antioch.

Third Journey. Antioch to Tarsus, Derbe, ...ystra, Iconium, Pessimus (in Galatia), Antioch (in Pisidia), Colossæ, Hierapolis, Laodicea, Philadelphia, Sardis, Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Assos, thence through Thrace, Macedonia and Greece, following practically the same route as on the second journey, and returning by land to Neapolis, across the strait to Troas; thence coastwise to Mitylene, Chios, Samos, Trogyllium, Miletus, Patara, and so on, past Cyprus to Tyre, in Palestine.

Herman Von B., Milwaukee. I am now a naturalized citizen of the United States. In my own land, I have a hereditary title. Does my American citizenship affect my position in such a way as to prevent me from using the title if I wish?

It is distinctly stated in the United States Naturalization Laws, that hereditary titles or orders of nobility must be renounced by the alien at the time of his application for citizenship.

Several readers have asked for the exact words of the "Mother Shipton" prophecy. Mr. R. E. Comstock, of Norwalk, Ct., has supplied them, as follows:

Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world, man's thoughts shall fly,
In the twinkling of an eye.
Waters, shall yet more wonders do;
How strange! but they shall all be true.
The world—upside down—shall be,
And gold, be found—at the root of a tree.
Through hills, men shall ride,
And no horse, or ass, beat his side;
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk;
In the air men shall be seen
In white, in black, in green.
Iron on the water shall float,
As easily as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found, and shown
In lands not now known.
England, shall at last admit a Jew,
And fire, and water, shall wonders do.
The world to an end shall come,
In eighteen hundred, and eighty-one.

Mother Shipton, of course, was a myth. The first line of her so called "prophecy," is popularly supposed to foretell the automobile. Mrs. L. B. H., of Chester, Ark., directs the attention of Reader, Portsmouth, Va., to the passage in Mahum 2:3, which some regard as much more explicit on the same subject.

M. C., Ware, Mass. How do you account for the repetition of II Kings 19 in Isaiah 37?

In much the same way as you will find documents repeated in modern books. Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg, for instance, would naturally appear in a history of the period, in his own biography, and in innumerable books of readings and recitations. If, as is possible, the story of Hezekiah's healing was written by Isaiah, the historian who was praparing the Kings may have secured a copy of it to incorporate in his books.

Miscellaneous Questions

Reader, Plainville, N. Y., and others. Official statistics of immigrant arrivals during May are not yet available.

H. J. McC., Pittsburg, Pa. You will find the nicknames of the States in almost any almanac published in your own city.

Mrs. M. R. C., Harvard, Neb. The list of Mayflower passengers, we believe, was complete, with the exception of servants, as stated.

H. M. S., Milbrook, N. Y. For further information concerning the Cumberland mountaineers, the Log College, etc., write to Rev. M. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky.

L. E. C., Middletown, S. Dak. We have heard of the power of people to locate water and minerals by the use of the "divining rod," etc., but cannot advise in the matter. If the experiment proceeds on scientific grounds, it may be worth considering; otherwise it is very likely humbug.

"The natives marry young, and we encourage them in this. They have a piece of ground, build their own homes, make their own furniture. We are building up a Christian community of this kind. If we take children at four or five years of age, they are married at sixteen or seventeen.

"There is a great opening in Liberia. We have there the College of West Africa, twenty-nine primary schools, and an Industrial School. There are several native stations, two or three missionaries, and from twenty to thirty children, just as many as we can take care of at these stations.

"Take the case of a native man and his wife, who were educated in our Mission. They went out and established another Mission, and now have about twenty native children with them. These children are cared for at very slight expense. We are striving to make them evangelists to their own people.

"In East Rhodesia we are establishing what ultimately will be one of the great mission centres of Africa. I went there first in 1897. We have there about 30,000 acres of land, about ten miles from the railroad. On the railroad is Umatilla, and there we are working among the Europeans. We have an Academy with four teachers, which is now self-supporting. The native work there is among a vast population; and just as fast as I can get the right kind of white evangelists, they go out to these towns. We get hold of the children and send them to our central station, where we have a girls' school and a boys' school.

"The denominations at work there are Presbyterian, Baptist and Congregationalist.

"The first natives that I baptized were a boy and a girl on the Congo, in 1897, during my first official visit. Some missionary took them to her new station with her, and they were kept in the Mission. I went out six years later, and found two of them married, the two I had baptized—and they had a nice little baby and were living in a pleasant place, in their own cottage, built by the husband, furnished with furniture made in the Mission workshops, of which he is foreman. I went in, sat down in that nice, clean Christian home, and we had family worship. The wife has proven to be a woman of remarkable spiritual gifts."

A few days ago, Bishop Hartzell sailed from New York for a general tour of all the African missions. It is expected that he will devote much attention to the progress of the child-saving experiment. Great spiritual results are anticipated. It is impossible to estimate the good that would follow from the "redemption" of a thousand of these little black children from lives of heathenism and slavery. If the Christian people of this country were to take up the work in Mozambique alone, where there are three millions of natives, including the Tongas, the warlike Machopas, the home-loving Batswas, and where polygamy and the sale of little slave-daughters is general, they might revolutionize that part of the Dark Continent in a single year. In five or six years, after training, the children would themselves be able to go out among their own people, with the message of the Gospel. Thus, year by year, the work would multiply itself, and souls would be won to the Kingdom.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that the plan of child redemption in Africa, as outlined by Bishop Hartzell and Missionary Richards, is one that promises the grandest spiritual results. You may never be able to go to the mission field in person, nor even to send a trained white substitute there; but you can lift up a black heathen boy or girl out of darkness and slavery, and place this little one, as your substitute, where, under God's blessing, he or she may work in the field and win souls to Christ.

We invite all of our readers who wish to have a share in this Christ-like work of Child-Redemption in Africa to send us their names and addresses. All such letters should be marked, "Child-Redemption, care THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, N.Y." Every letter will receive attention, and the fullest information will be sent to all concerning this unique and beautiful way of working for the Master in heathen Africa.

The Power of the Spirit*

What the Holy Spirit Can Do for the Nature and Life of Man

LARGE is the subject to be compressed into the consideration of a single hour. Those who know anything of it by actual experience will shrink from taking it up in its entirety. The Holy Spirit so inspires and operates on the believer's nature and life at every point, that it is not long before he discovers that the Holy Spirit is his life. It is so from the beginning. What is the difference between two young persons who have both been reared in Christian homes yet one converted and the other unconverted? The beliefs of both are practically the same. The unconverted person believes that Jesus Christ came in the flesh, lived and died to save men from their sins and redeem them from eternal death. But the belief has no more effect upon him than has the belief that the world revolves around the sun. It is simply head-knowledge. He has not received the Holy Spirit which makes it heart-knowledge. The converted person with the same belief has been changed into a new man by the power of the Spirit. He has been quickened in the truest sense of the word. The old dull, dreary effort to live a good life has been turned into a joyful, triumphant enthusiasm. We know what that word means in ordinary life. Two men go out to witness the arrival in a town of some great general who has fought in the war. One has read of his battles and struggles and victories and longs to see the great man. The other was on his staff in the campaign and witnessed the crises through which he passed. What a difference there will be in the enthusiasm of the two as the general is greeted! The enthusiasm which the Holy Spirit kindles makes Christ real to the heart. Then the work goes forward day by day. The life implanted is divine life. It grows, it spreads, it expels sin from the heart, it arouses an intense desire for holiness, it gives power for service, fortitude in suffering, activity in service and increase in all grace. How? We know not. We know only by what we see and feel and we know, too, that as a father gives bread to his children so the Holy Spirit will be given to those who ask.

Called Higher

Here is a letter from a reader in Austin, Minn., which breathes consolation and hope to every sorrowing heart:

This time I write to you it is with great sadness For years my dear old mother has welcomed your valuable paper, and been greatly helped by it. February 21 she went away from me forever on this earth, to join the "Choir Invisible," leaving a world made better by her presence. If she had lived until this month the 14th, she would have been ninety-five years of age; young in looks and heart, by her life preaching the gospel of cheerfulness and sweetness and faithfulness. Most fully was her heart filled with love toward all, and with malice toward none. She passed to her reward like the sun of our western prairies—quietly, gloriously beautiful—her last days her best ones. May God bless you in your efforts to ameliorate the conditions of suffering humanity, and to promote the kingdom of Him who said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me." MRS. A. D. D.

For Young and Old

The Hall of Fame is a source of information and pleasure to me. It is suitable for old and young alike. My little grandson takes as much delight in hearing about the men and their pictures, as I do in reading and describing them to him. The pictures are things of beauty, and will be a joy forever. Each one has a charm peculiar to itself, calling forth a response different from all the rest, and suggesting a different lesson.

DIVINE INSTRUMENTS

ow God Tests Men Whom He Calls to His Service

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW often we see those for whom we pray persisting in a path which we know will only bring trouble upon them as well as shonor upon God. Do not let us think is lost, or that our prayers are forgotten. od let Israel eat the fruit of their own ay, that they might be broken, and so ight learn to know him and to distrust emselves. Saul had not sought God, t God would visit him, and was willing make him his instrument. When God us draws near to and works mightily on a man, he is brought into a position no small responsibility. If he yields to od, and becomes a living sacrifice, at od's disposal, as were Moses, David, d Elijah, God may greatly use him to s glory. But if he does not yield, God nnot use him. "The spirit should fail be- re Me, and the soul which I have made" a. 57:15). Saul did not stand the test. od would not call him to such a position thout giving him a special equipment; could draw nigh unto God, he could be s instrument; but in the end he failed.

Meanwhile, Samuel gathered the people gether, reminded them how the Lord d delivered them from the Egyptians, d from all that had oppressed them, and w they now had rejected their God and manded a king, and he caused all the bes of Israel to come near, and the tribe Benjamin was taken, the family of atri, and Saul the son of Kish. In self- nscious modesty he had hidden himself nong the stuff, but, when found, he stood ad and shoulders taller than all the ople, just such a man as human nature uld delight in; something to look at; meone who looks imposing. Yes—too rong for God. And all the people outed, "God save the king!" Then muel told the people the manner of the ngdom, probably from Deut. 17:14-20, he had told them the manner of the king- m foreseen by God (II. Sam. 8:11-18). And Samuel wrote it in a book, and laid up before the Lord."

What must it have been for Samuel to e the people whom he had loved, whom e had borne upon his heart, and for whom was a continual intercessor, thus wil- lly and obstinately preferring a man to le over them in the place of God?

At this time Saul held no court, but ved quietly at home, and worked on the rm, apparently waiting, as Samuel had njoined him, for an opportunity to "do s occasion serve," for God was with him . Samuel 10:7). The occasion arose. ahash the Ammonite came up and en- amped against Jabesh-Gilead. The men f Jabesh, without inquiring of the Lord, nd quite ignoring Saul, actually requested he Ammonites to make a covenant with hem, and they would serve them! Where as the faith that God would deliver them om all their enemies? Alas! faith in od was the exception in Israel. Nahash ontemptuously answered that he would nake a covenant with them on condition hat he thrust out all their right eyes. and id it for a reproach on all Israel. Then hey bethought them of their king, and ent messengers to Saul, who thus got his pportunity. The people of Gibeah wept t the tidings, and the Spirit of the Lord ame on Saul.

He slew a yoke of oxen, hewed them in ieces, and sent them throughout all Israel aying so should it be done to the oxen of very man that came not after Saul and amuel. The fear of the Lord fell on the eople, and with one consent, from all the ribes of Israel, they gathered together ntil he had an army gathered together at Bezek, where they encamped. But Saul ent messengers to the men of Jabesh- Gilead: "To-morrow, by the time the sun e hot, ye shall have help." It was the Spirit of the Lord upon Saul, who taught im what to do. He divided his army nto three companies. They must have ad a night march, for they came into the midst of the host of the Ammonites in the morning watch—i.e., between 3 and 6 A.M. —and they slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day, and all who were not slain were scattered, so that no two were left together. These were early days of the kingdom, and Israel had not learned how much her own neglect and disobedi- nce had brought upon her the many troubles which had visited her.

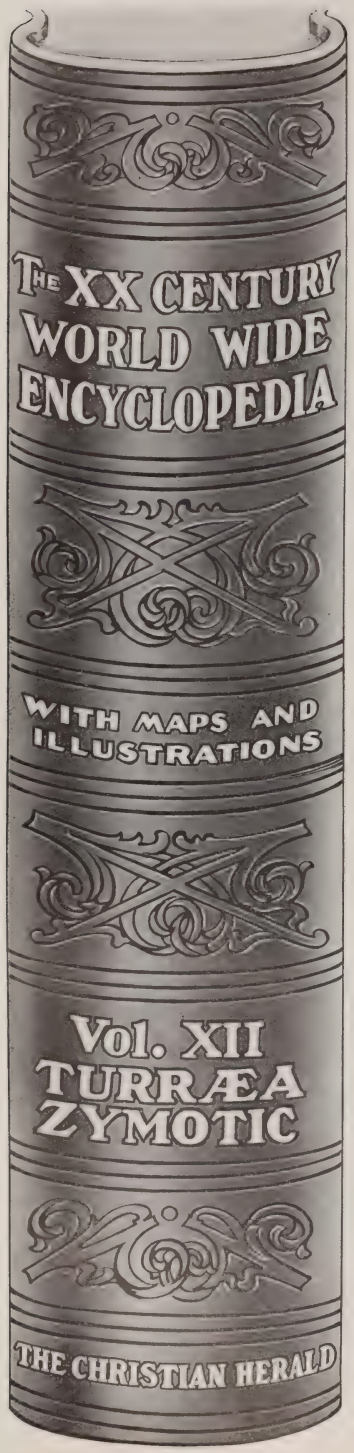
Our Great Encyclopedia Offer



12 VOLUMES THIS SIZE

A New Work Never Before Printe

Everything Absolutely New

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is not an old work brought down to date by the patching up of old plates, but is an absolutely new production, just completed from new plates made from new type, and never before printed from. It contains the very latest information on every subject that can engage the human mind. Undertaken for the express purpose of providing the best Encyclopedia ever published, the Editor and his three hundred specialists have spared neither pains nor expense to carry out the trust with which they were commissioned.

The Best Work of its Kind

Each one of the 75,000 subjects handled have been carefully and scientifically considered, and treated as though the reputation of the entire work depended on that particular article. Hence we have a work more thorough, more comprehensive, more intelligible, even to the untutored mind, than dozens of more pretentious and infinitely more expensive productions.

Just Published A. D. 1903

As a Universal Educator, THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is absolutely unsurpassed. It is a great compendium of all human knowledge, whether pertaining to History, Science, Art, Invention, Geography, Biography, Literature, Commerce, Manufacture, or any other subject. It takes in the whole range, and affords, in the most accessible shape, all the light available to the most careful research, and highest expert authority.

It is very important that the reader bear in mind that this is a New Work, and hence, though an Encyclopedia may already enrich his library, this latest production is nevertheless necessary, in order that he may be posted up to date. An old encyclopedia, set ten or twenty years ago, with a few statistics doctored up to make them current—though bound in genuine Turkey Morocco, or Russia—is still an old work of reference, and affords no later information on science, invention, wars, or the recent events of importance than was contained in the manuscript when first written, twenty or more years ago.

Twentieth Century Information

The Scholar, the Student, the Professional Man, the Banker, the Merchant, the Mechanic, the Laborer, the Housekeeper, the Mother, the Wife, require up-to-date information. The ideas of the last decade will not apply to-day. Things have changed, progress has been made, and an Encyclopedia of the Nineteenth Century is as antiquated in the Twentieth Century as the summer's fashions of 1880 differ from those of 1903.

Contains Most Recent Subjects

Just think of getting your information about Cuba, Philippines, Electricity, Motors, Automobiles, Klondike, South Africa, The Hague Tribunal, and other modern subjects, from a work compiled in 1880, or even before. Surely a few statistical alterations concerning Population, Exports, Imports, etc., will throw no additional ligh current matters which interest the great human fa far more than mere recent additions to Populatio immaterial changes in the extent of our Commerce. T TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE EN CLOPEDIA is a work of To-day, and handles e subject from the view-point of 1903, and, indeed, m things look quite differently to us now than they twenty years or more ago.

No Patched-Up Plates

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WI ENCYCLOPEDIA throws a new light on the affair the world. It has a new view-point. The world made wonderful progress in every direction. It does stand still in the matters of Invention, Commerce, Literature, Manufactures and Science, while statis change, but its progress is in all directions, and so things that are perfection to-day were not even thou of ten years ago. Hence Encyclopedic knowledge ever changing and ever advancing. We live in a bu bustling, active age, and a year of the present is equal a decade a quarter of a century ago. Surely the Encyclopedias, with doctored statistics, do not and c not satisfy the demand for up-to-date information.

Twelve Mammoth Volumes

The publishers of THE TWENTIETH CENTUR WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA realized this fa and therefore they had a new work prepared, new written, newly set, and newly printed. And it is t great work, the result of the most modern research, t we here offer in twelve mammoth volumes of nea 700 pages each, with maps of every country and sta beautifully printed, and with many superb half-tone f page inserts, illustrating the progress of the world in its various and exceedingly interesting phases, all attra tively and substantially bound in high grade cloth a genuine gold.

ONE OF THE MID-DAY MEETINGS IN THE MACHINE SHOPS

THE GIANT BIBLE CLASS IN LOUISVILLE'S MACHINE SHOPS

Found Christ in the Workshop

FORTY CONVERSIONS BESIDE THE BENCHES AND FORGES

IT is astonishing how the thought of the Divine love and fellowship can sweeten labor and lighten the burden of toil. As in the old legend, the giant, stricken to earth, always found renewed strength and vigor when lying prostrate, so the humblest of Christian souls, borne down by the heat and burden of the day, finds in a brief interval of prayer and meditation, new strength for the task before him.

SIDNEY JONES, SECRETARY

In the great shops of one of Louisville, Kentucky's, biggest railway companies, is a remarkable Bible class. For pupils it has men who toil all day long at bench and forge, among the deafening noise of the machines. A year ago, these men—over fifteen thousand in number—spent their dinner-hour in card-playing and similar recreations, after the meal had been disposed of. Now, when the twelve o'clock whistle blows, the whirr of the machinery promptly ceases, tools are laid aside, and the workshops are turned into meeting-rooms, where hundreds of men gather to hear the Gospel.

The first meeting was held in the Louisville railway shops about two years ago. As an outgrowth of these gatherings, two Bible classes were organized last year. Besides these, two evangelistic meetings are held weekly. Over twenty-five thousand men attended the series of meetings last year. Four days in every week the men give up twenty-eight minutes out of the forty allowed for dinner, to attend the religious services. Recently, this unique Bible class celebrated its first anniversary in the workshop where it had organized. The attendance was very large. Mr. Jones, secretary of the organization, states that the men have shown a wonderful amount of interest, and made substantial progress in the work done by the Bible class during its first year.

"For several years," he said, "the men did nothing at noon but amuse themselves in a way that, in many cases, was far from profitable. It was a splendid opening for our work, and several of the men in high office in the company were soon interested. Rev. M. M. Bruce, the superintendent, seemed to know how to gain the men's attention. Before long, the meetings, that started with only a few members, were crowded. Many came out of curiosity, stayed to the end, and came again. We have among our ten or fifteen thousand employees all denominations represented, so we decided to make the meetings non-sectarian. We invited men and clergymen of all religious sects to talk to the men about the matters which come into their daily lives. The meetings grew so large that before many months we had a regularly organized Bible class, and evangelical meetings. Officers were selected from the men among whom we were working. That was the beginning of our present huge Bible class, the biggest in the world.

"The attendance grew so large," he continued, "that the Bible class was divided into two, so that now, with the two extra meetings, as many of the men as wish to can attend at least one service a week, and one of the classes. In this way, we are able to do the Bible class work more satisfactorily. It is not easy to conduct such an enormous class, when only a half-hour is devoted to it each time.

"In a year, the system of religious services held in the shops has made a record unequalled by any other like undertaking. Our members—men who do all sorts of work in the machine shops, and who come to the meetings just as they are, grimy and greasy—are as much in earnest as any of the well-groomed and wealthy, whose work in this direction has gained them wide renown.

"The workmen have now formed committees for promoting and keeping up different branches, and to induce other men to 'join the ranks.' One committee, within two hours, secured enough funds among the men to purchase a portable organ, which is used at each of the meetings. An excellent orchestra has been formed, with one of their number—a Russian exile—as the leader. A cornet, first and second violin, bass viol, and two guitars, compose it, and the good music has a very large share in the drawing of new members to the classes. We have leaders in the singing who have remarkably good voices, too. One man, Sebastian Groves—one of the grimy men in the freight-car building department—has a fortune in his throat. His talent is a wonderful tenor voice, which is the delight of his fellow-workers, and a marvel to all who attend the meetings. When the men learn that he is to sing one of his solos, they flock to hear him, and listen with rapt attention. He has had flattering offers to sing in church choirs, but he is still satisfied to sing only to his fellow-workers, who know him best and appreciate him highly.

"Henry Golden, another workman at the shops, is an accomplished organist. Undoubtedly these meetings have drawn the church and workingman close together, and through these they can keep in touch with each other. The influence is plainly shown in the shops by the improved demeanor of the men. There is less swearing and more regular habits, and there is a goodly attendance at the different churches in the city. As a result of the meetings last year, forty men openly confessed Christ, and ninety united with the various churches."

This is surely a glorious showing for a single year of Christian effort among these hitherto neglected men of the railroad machine shops. They have been taught that the superintendent, and those who are in authority over them, take a deeper interest in them than that which merely relates to their manual work in the shops, and that there is nothing that can sweeten life, or make it thoroughly wholesome and enjoyable, like true religion in the heart. It is remarkable that, among such a large number of men, the verdict in favor of this new departure should have been so unanimous. They feel the social as well as the spiritual uplift; they see that there is no class distinction and no respect of persons—that all are brothers, and treated with the same fraternal spirit of good-will and mutual helpfulness.

Sometime ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an account of a similar work, which was conducted by Mr. L. H. Creager, of the little city of Washington, Ind. Mr. Creager employs in his factory a large number of men in the manufacture of bent wood products. A Christian himself, he endeavored to interest his men in religion and to persuade them to attend church. To his surprise, he learned that many of them stayed away from church on account of the social distinctions that prevailed in the place. A little further inquiry convinced him that they would welcome an opportunity to hear the Gospel, and when he proposed to them that a brief, simple service should be held in the factory building mornings, before beginning work, they cordially approved the plan. The Rev. J. J. Gorby, a local pastor, gave his hearty cooperation, and in a room, full of machines, wheels and belting, was held the first of a series of the most unique Gospel services. Every week day morning, beginning at seven o'clock, fifteen minutes are devoted to a plain talk upon practical things, with a spiritual application. No one is ever late, the minister and his audience always arriving punctually on time. The seed sown in those early morning services is falling into good ground and will yet bear much fruit. The time employed in these meetings is not deducted from the men's pay, and the preacher is regularly paid for his services. Mr. Creager does not pose among his workmen as a reformer; he simply puts before them the proposition that Christianity and right living pay, and that if a man desires to have God's blessing and approval in this world, and acceptance in the life to come, he must forsake evil and do right, and that the only way to do this is to do it through Christ as Saviour and Helper.

These novel phases of Christian work in two States present an example of spiritual activity on modern lines which might be followed with advantage in many other localities.

THE VISION OF GOD

A Sermon by REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, of London

Preached in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn

TEXTS { Matt. 5: 8: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God"
John 14: 7: "If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also; but from henceforth ye know him and have seen him"

CITY TEMPLE, LONDON

THE former of our two texts, as I need not remind you, is a part of that compendium of the teaching of Jesus which we have been accustomed to describe as "The Sermon on the Mount." It may be a question, however, whether our Lord on this occasion, at any rate, did deliver a sermon, if he ever delivered a sermon; but I do not myself believe that these beautiful, deathless words were spoken to a great multitude. The indications are to the contrary. Observe the closing verses of the fourth chapter, how multitudes pressed upon the Master, and he healed them, and, seeing the number increased, and that the time had come to withdraw from them, he did so, and the first verse of our chapter says: "Seeing the multitudes he went up into a mountain, and when he was set his disciples came unto him." Not the multitude, but a few, and I venture to believe, that our Lord gathered around him there a little group of people whom he meant to teach; slowly, carefully, and painstakingly, the solemn truths about the Kingdom.

Everybody in that day knew that Christ had to come with good tidings about the Kingdom, because everybody was looking for that Kingdom. But what kind of a kingdom? In the mind of the Jew what kind of a kingdom was the Kingdom of God, about which everybody was speaking? As you know, the Roman eagles were then set up in Israel; the Roman soldiers were trampling Jewish patriotism under foot, and the Jewish people hated, with a bitter hatred, those who had dragged their religion and patriotism in the dust. They were looking for a Messiah who should do as Judas Maccabeus did when he delivered his country from foreign domination. They expected the Messiah to set up the Israelitish kingdom, nay more, grasping the sceptre of the Cæsars, to wield it over imperial Rome as well as over Israel. That was the spirit of the kingdom they were looking for.

The Expected Kingdom

A good many people have had the same dream since that day. Savonarola had it, and for a time, it seemed, he had brought it about in Florence. You know how that kingdom flourished. Before very long the apostle thereof had been done to death at the stake in Florence by the people he came to serve. So it has almost always been with the prophets. Our Puritan fathers had that dream. They could not realize it in England, so some of them came here, and the very name of your church perpetuates the history of that time. It was a magnificent failure, but it is coming to its triumph now.

The Kingdom of God is a thing that comes slowly. Men have hoped for it through the long centuries. Some day, some day we shall see it when "the earth is filled with knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." The advent of Jesus was prepared for by the voice crying in the wilderness, hailing the coming King. "Is he the one, then, who shall restore the Kingdom of God in Israel?" said Peter and James and John. "Now," said they, "we shall hear about the Kingdom."

How did Jesus begin to teach them? Observe the slight discrepancy between Matthew and Luke. This gives me a clue to the way the Master taught on the mountain top. You see that Matthew began: "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven." Luke's version is: "Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the Kingdom of God." Which is right? Which is wrong? Both right; neither wrong; it is certain that Jesus said both. Each beatitude was a lesson for the day. Perhaps Jesus began this way: "You are expecting to hear about the Kingdom. Well, now, Peter, how do suppose that the Kingdom will come?" Peter would say: "We have all got to enlist. We will follow you. Lift up the old banner of Israel, and see how many will come to your side."

"What sort of people will I want first, Peter?" "First you must call in the Pharisees. They are the natural leaders of Israel; they are our religious authority; they are the men who pull the first stroke. Let us call them, and we shall take our places behind them. Such are the recruits of the Kingdom." The Master would say: "Now listen, Peter, blessed are the poor men—yourselves, for yours is the Kingdom of God." There would be a dead silence, I will be bound; because, however, things are in America, it is a little bit different in the Old World. Over our way, the poor man does not reckon himself to be of much account when it comes to founding kingdoms. The Master would go on: "You get your living on the sea, you fishermen who draw nets in the night. You people whom nobody wants or counts when anything big is to be done. Blessed are ye poor; for yours is the Kingdom of God, if ye only knew it." Again, there would be silence, for then, as now, there is no chance for the poor man at all. A poor man has to keep quiet in the presence of his betters; he has to take what another man says; he has to give place to the rich man. The spirit natural to a poor man he may keep, or he may not. Some poor men don't. The spirit natural to the rich man is not that one, but the Master said: "Blessed is that man, whether poor or rich, who can be poor in spirit."

Conditions of the Vision

Now, look for a moment at the first part. Matthew sat with his pencil and waited for the second. He wrote down: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of God." That would do for one day. Another day the Master said: "Peter, John, would you like to see the God to whom we pray? Would you like to see him?" "Impossible!" would be the reply. "Clouds and darkness are round about Jehovah; there is danger on Mount Sinai; thunder and lightning guard the throne of God. No man hath seen God at any time. To look upon God! Ah, that would be to die! I am undone when I have seen the Lord of Hosts." Then the Master would say: "Stay a little. There are more ways than one of seeing a thing. I can give you a vision. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

I venture to say, my friends, that none of those simple men understood more than just a little of what the Master meant. They did not alter their minds nor outlook upon the Kingdom in the least. They followed him for a year and a-half, maybe—how much longer I do not know—and still they did not see what he meant by the Kingdom and the vision. That was given to the poor in heart. And at last they come to the "upper room," and there they gathered round about him. They did not know it, but it was to say good-bye before the tragedy of Calvary, the central event in the world's history.

Jesus spoke about going away, and they felt, for the first time, how much they were going to lose, supposing the Master was not to be the Messiah after all. Supposing Jesus went away. They did not want him to go. They had learned to love him, and I am sure you will agree with me when I say, although they were not aware of it, they had never been so near to God before as when they were sitting at the feet of Jesus. They never made any creed about it, but somehow they felt that they had come into contact with the Father as they had never done before. Jesus was going, and at the terrible news their hearts sank. "Lord, show us the Father, and we shall be satisfied," said one of them. "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father."

Early Glimpses

Even then they did not get behind the mystical veil as you and I are getting behind it now as I speak. We do not want in a way to crush all God into the figure of the human Jesus, and say, "There, that is all there is, and all there is to be." We do not mean that, and Jesus did not mean that. This is all he meant, and it is true: If God be like Jesus, it is well for men. We may have many things to learn concerning the purposes of God after we have looked upon the face of Christ, but we have nothing more to learn about himself—he will be the same to all eternity. We cannot explain in human language what we mean when we say, Jesus is God; but, believe me, you will never learn any more about the love of God to all eternity than you know when you have really got a grasp of what is meant by the love of Christ. The thought that Jesus and the Father are one is more to me than any metaphysical proposition. As I pray to the Father, I always see the face of Jesus Christ. He could guarantee God. "In the bosom of the Father he hath declared him." There is the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. These men felt all this; it had not become a creed, but it was already an experience; and when my second text was spoken they were nearer to what we know as a vision of God than they had ever been before. This is only exordium. I want to apply it.

We are just in the position of these simple men, and are seeking, as they sought, for the vision of God. As Dr. Hillis said yesterday, quoting some one else, "men are incurably religious." Yes, often when they seem not to be. Sometimes men will not listen to a preacher because they feel that he knows no more than they do about that mysterious somewhat, who hides His face behind the clouds. I do not believe there is a man in New York or Brooklyn, who would not this morning, if he could, have a vision of the Most High; and if I could, without trouble and sorrow and sacrifice, I would be among the great company who stand, adorin round the throne of God. I believe there is somethir in us that pants for God. As Augustine said: "Thc hast made us for Thyself, and our hearts are not at re until they find rest in Thee." This is the mood in whic we find ourselves."

How many of us have a vision of God? Have yo have you? No; there is very little in our outward lit to remind us of God at all. In the struggle for the dc lar we cannot see much of God. In America, politic sometimes makes you wonder if he has taken his han off the helm. Then it may take a cataclysm—it may t a civil war—to deepen within you all that you shoul have thought of before. God is, in our most deep an solemn moments we feel it, and we have and can hav no companion but him; and when we seek him we just as Peter and John did—turn to Christ craving. W feel a need somehow, and if there is a way unto Go for us, if the curtain could ever be drawn aside, the wa must be Jesus, it will be his hand that draws aside th curtain that veils the seen from the unseen. The bes of humanity have felt it—the noblest that England an America have produced have felt it that the Christ ha given us God. It is Jesus' God that we worship. A Browning says in his "Saul:"

Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for! my flesh tha
I seek
In the Godhead! I seek and I find it. O Saul it shall be
A face like my face that receives thee; a man like to me,
Thou shalt love and be loved by forever; a hand like thi hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See th
Christ stand!

Jesus gives me all I want of God. If there is a cravin not yet satisfied, it will be by and by; we shall see an know more on the other side than we see here.

An Enchanting Prospect

Yesterday, at luncheon, Dr. Hillis and a few friend were talking about your illustrious pastor, Mr. Beecher and one of them told me this story, which is probably familiar to you, but it struck home to me for the firs time. It was given on the authority of Major Pond whom I expected to see here this morning, and very sorry I am for the reason that keeps him away: No long before his death Mr. Beecher and Major Pond were together, and Beecher, leaning forward, without in troduction said, with tears in his eyes, "Pond, think o it, only think of it, soon I shall see Jesus!" That was spoken in the nineteenth century. Let me remind you of something which was written in the twelfth. Beecher might have said it, but it was St. Bernard:

Jesus, the very thought of thee,
With sweetness fills my breast,
But sweeter far thy face to see
And in thy presence rest.

I am told that for forty years or more you have had flowers on this platform every Sunday. Is that so? Suppose somebody in the audience to be color blind. The white and the gold and the green will be all the same to him—probably the color of this New York June, that is gray. I am also told that there is something like a renaissance in America of enthusiasm for art. The gospel of the beautiful is here everywhere, and men will listen to that gospel. Now, suppose you are asked to tell me what the sense of beauty is. There is no man or woman in the church who could tell me anything about it because we do not know. It is one of God's mysteries. One of the great wonders of the human spirit is that there is beauty to be seen; but you have to know something of beauty yourself before you see it to be beautiful. The beauty is in you to begin with, and then you see it here.

This is but a sacrament. You are united to the great whole of things when you see these flowers to be beautiful. They speak to you of God, simply because you are like God yourself. There is a beauty within that resides there—a symbol of the beauty without. Nor is that all. The purity of heart, of which the Master speaks, which is bringing something to the vision, you understand, is not to be confused with purity of character. They may be the same, but they may not. When I speak about the heart of a little child I am speaking about purity of heart; but a little child, you know, is not a saint. The saint and the child are near together, but the child has a long way to go before it comes round to the saint.

Purity of heart is not purity of character, but it implies simplicity, earnestness, single-mindedness, humility. Now, believe me, I do not want to attempt, to pretend, to teach you how to govern yourselves in America. I have noticed already that there is one virtue in which you do not excel any more than we do at home—that is humility. I should very much like to see that gift flourish on both sides of the Atlantic. Mark Twain says, somewhere, that he discovered at the time of the Diamond Jubilee that the English were mentioned in the Bible—in the Beatitudes—"The meek shall inherit the earth." Well, our cousins on this side can help us out. Humility is not a fashionable virtue in Anglo-Saxon countries. However it may suit us, as nationalities, to hold our own because of the commission God hath given us to the world, when we come to our dealings with God, a broken and a contrite heart is the only way in. There is no way round. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" No. But unto the babes he is revealed.

You can be simple sometimes in a time of trouble. It is wonderful how we strip the trappings off, and our real self appears when we are bowed down. Sometimes a man discovers himself in the hour of darkness. He never knew what he was until that season came. That is God's chance. Whenever a man is low down, with the cross on top of him, that is the time to feel the pressure of God's hand; and somehow we all turn wistfully to Jesus when there is any question of a broken heart. He is the Comforter, the Saviour; and, best of all, he is a Saviour who can save, and the Comforter who can comfort, for he sits up there on the throne of the universe, Lord over all.

The other day I met with some wonderful testimony concerning this very truth. I am not attempting to prove it; I am only holding it up. A young man who is at work in London told me this concerning his life in America and England. He is the son of a British general, born to high estates himself, and was an officer in the British army. His commission was taken from him for bad conduct, and he was exiled from home. He came to this country, went from bad to worse, and sank lower and lower, until at last he became a common soldier—shall I say a private soldier?—in your army when it disclosed of Spanish pretensions a little south of here. Perhaps I have not stated that properly. He went from bad to worse, but there was a gleam of something better when he enlisted.

After the war he left the army, and went on his own resources. He said there was scarcely any sin he did not commit—sins of the flesh, I mean. We are harder on those, somehow, than we are on sins of a different kind. If a man makes a pile he can sin with impunity, but if a man has little to spend and gives away his constitution, we dance upon him. He left that place in disgrace, and went back to the West and got a situation as a gardener—this son of a British general. Then he came to himself in the "far country." It was not an earthly father he was thinking about—he was afraid to go home to him—but of a heavenly one. He didn't know much about God, but this is his account of it: "I was at work one day," he said, "when I seemed to hear a voice within, a voice not my own, protesting, and calling me. It seemed as if the spirit of all things was speaking to me. I found myself saying 'I do not know why, 'If you will help me, I will.' That was Pauline in its significance. I had never heard anything like it. He went to a minister to see if he could not be put on the right way. The minister could not understand what he was driving at, so he left him, brought a Bible and began to read. By and bye he turned up the chapter you and I read this morning, the fourteenth of John. "Up to that time," he said, "I had a thousand times repeated in church, as a child, at the tailend of the collect, the phrase, 'through Jesus Christ our Lord,' but I never knew who Jesus was. Now, when I read those words, I found out: 'Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in me,' and 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' I said to myself: 'Now, I know who Jesus is.' 'His was the voice that spake to me in the garden.'"

It is good theology. Christ has far more to do with you than you have with him, and what I have been telling you this morning, is indelible truth. You could not wipe it out with the worst life that ever was lived. Christ is the spirit of all things, the Master of all. He is the deeper self within the soul of every man, no matter how sunken or low down. The Christ came, the Christ follows, the Christ saves.

Then, to enter into union with such a Christ is possible here and now. There are some here who found that out long ago, who know there is a Christ. If we denied it they would say: "I know whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him." "But you cannot see Him." Yes, you can. Communion of the soul is the only real communion. You can live close up to the Christ, and look up into his god like face all the time, and no one can take you from him, and you can feel, if you cannot prove, that the Christ cares for you and belongs to you, and speaks to you. He looks upon you and you know his face. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," and you know that because you are trying to bring something to the Christ—a broken life which He is mending; a faulty character which He is to cure, and Christ takes just what you have to bring and makes it whole.

There is another name I should like to mention before I close: John Zundel. I never saw him, but I remember reading about him and that great organ, if it is the same one. Mr. Beecher said some organists never knew what to play when the sermon was over. "But," he said, "John Zundel does. According to what I have said, he speaks on the organ." Suppose one entered the church just after Mr. Beecher had finished speaking and heard John play. He had not heard what had gone before and might ask one: "Play on, for we plainly something Later I am not in the mood for what you are playing." The congregation would soon put him right. Then would say: "You would have been in the mood for it if you had heard what had gone before. All was pleading together. Your poor, Whittier, wrote:

> For myself alone I should
> All is dark. I know, without
> A sign the beauty fades
> I sense the need, but not the good
> Yet with humble trust in God's eternal
> And on earth by chastened power,
> I am groping for the door
> Of the heavenly harmonies.

We are all groping for the keys of the heavenly harmonies. We want to be at one with God, and we are not. Perhaps some day with millionless harmony around the throne, when we see the "King in his beauty," in the "land that is afar off," we shall understand how much we owe to the invisible Friend, whom not having seen we love, and yet whom we do not with the heart that craves for a brighter vision still. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God. It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

[Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, was crowded almost to suffocation when the foregoing sermon was delivered. The aisles, and even the preacher's platform, were thronged. The enormous audience listened intently as in ringing, melodious tones Mr. Campbell proclaimed his message. He is comparatively a young man, yet his thick hair is prematurely gray. Though the son of a Methodist minister, and educated under the care of a Presbyterian Elder, his leaning was originally toward the Church of England, and he entered Oxford University with the intention of becoming a clergyman of that Church. His studies, however, convinced him that he could not find a congenial home there, and after his graduation he accepted the pastorate of a Congregational Church at Brighton. After a wonderfully successful service there, he preached, during Dr. Parker's illness, at the City Temple, London, at the mid-day services held there every Thursday. The large church was crowded, and the interest in the service increased. When Dr. Parker died, Mr. Campbell was invited to succeed him, and he has accepted. In reference to his visit to this country, he modestly says, he has not come to teach, but to learn and to study our methods, in the hope that he may find some which can be adopted in his own work.]

A MODEL BOYS' CLUB

IT IS IN FALL RIVER, AND HAS 2,200 MEMBERS AND A BEAUTIFUL BUILDING—THE WORK DESCRIBED

THE BOYS' CLUB-HOUSE, FALL RIVER, MASS.

WHILE the boys' club is at best a poor substitute for the happy, healthful influence a boy ought to find in his own home, it is a far better place than the street. Workers with boys find that clubs of various kinds have been in a large degree helpful in solving the boy problem.

Mr. Henry F. Burt, leader of the Boys' Clubs at Chicago Commons, said recently of the organizations: "The club can do for the boy what is much harder for any individual to do—it can develop and create self respect. With many of our boys, this is not necessary; but with the boy from the poor home, and especially from the real poverty home, 'don't care' is the problem to face. This is because he has been deprived of the necessities required to look and act decently. He is robbed of self-respect. Another purpose of the club is to make that boy care to be clean in person and in dress; to make him care for school, and to make him care what he does. The club is of no value except as it stands for order. Order is a thing every child should learn; but the fact remains that many of the boys in our crowded centres go absolutely unrestrained, except when in school. After the parents have worked hard all day or night, and returned to their home, they are too tired to attempt to control their boys; or they see so little of their children, that they think it cruel to use discipline. This means that when the child wants to do anything, he is going to do it."

A Fall River philanthropist has sought to solve the problem of the poor boys of that town in a measure, by building and equipping one of the finest club-houses for boys in America. This beautiful building, which was mentioned sometime ago in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was built and equipped by Matthew C. D. Borden, at a cost of $85,000, and Mr. Borden has been heard to say that he thinks it has been one of the most profitable investments he ever made. Hundreds and thousands of Fall River boys are quite sure that it has been one of the most profitable investments ever made for their direct benefit. From a very small beginning, ten or twelve years ago, the Fall River Boys' Club has grown until it has a membership of nearly twenty-two hundred, which makes it, perhaps, the largest boys' club in America, if not in the world. The club owns not only its great club-house, but also a fine farm, on which the boys have their summer outings, and on which they have the educational privilege, valuable to every boy, of coming near to the heart of nature.

The Fall River Club has for its superintendent Mr. Thomas Chew, who was himself once a poor boy, working in the mills. He knows just what the home of the average mill-boy is.

The mill-boys, and all of the poor boys of Fall River, have in the club a handsome, well-warmed, well-lighted, and cheery place, where they may spend their spare time amid the helpful influence of books, pictures, cleanliness and brightness. Here they may play their games or engage in athletic amusements in the gymnasium, or swim in the great swimming pool, which is to most of them the most fascinating part of the club-house. Here they are kept from the temptations that assail the boys of the street. Here they are taught the necessity and the value of saving a part of their small earnings.

Industrial training now has a place in all educational and reformatory work, and it has a prominent place in the Fall River Boys' Club. There are classes in carpentry, printing and drawing. Each boy is given a blank form, in which he is asked to write his name, age, residence, the year, day and month of his birth, and what he would like to be when he is a man. All of the boys who would like to be doctors are grouped together, and once a month a lady member of the Board of Directors of the club provides light refreshments for this group of would-be doctors, and some real doctor gives them a talk regarding the work of a physician. The group of lawyers in embryo meet and are addressed by a lawyer, and the "sailors" hear all about the life of a sailor from some one who knows all about it.

A summer vacation school, during the progress of which both boys and girls enjoy the privileges of the club, is one feature of the work done by this model club. The farm that is such a delight to the boys, was given to the club by Mr George W. Dean. It consisted of 155 acres, to which eighty acres have lately been added. Here the boys learn about farming, and receive the physical, mental and moral uplift that comes from a taste of real rural life. At the tenth annual meeting of the club, the 650 boys who sat down to luncheon were delighted to have letters read to them from President McKinley, Governor Crane and Mr. Borden.

A great many workers with boys agree with Jacob Riis when he says, after many years of experience trying to solve the problem of the boy: "We build jails when we ought to build schools. You see, we have got hold of the wrong end of the whole business. Any kindergarten teacher can tell you that it is easy to form the character of the young. That is the reason why we make boys' clubs. That is why we make kindergartens, or establish places to take the young out of the slums and show them that God's world is beautiful and great. And when they come home with those things, then you can talk to them of church and heaven. Before that, it will go into one ear and out at the other. You can never make any one understand about heaven, until they have an embodiment of it in their own lives."

The World's W.C.T.U. Convention in Switzerland

THE sixth Convention of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union held in Geneva, Switzerland, from June 8 to 11, though small, will rank as one of the most enthusiastic and important, for the changes made in the constitution. The American delegation numbered sixty, while the English Scotch and Welsh had eighty-six delegates, and there were two hundred and fifty visitors. Still the American was probably the most representative delegation, and it was evident that the American influence was predominant, and that most of the important work was in the hands of the American women. As the Rev. C. M. Belden, the rector of the American church in Geneva, said in his welcome address, the world would always remember that the society originated in America, and that its great good had been accomplished, in a great measure, by Americans.

ANNA A. GORDON

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, vice-president of the World's and president of the United States W. C. T. U., was chairman of the Convention. The American members were invited to stay in London a few days before the date of departure for the Continent, and they were entertained there by Lady Henry Somerset, who had various parties of them out at Higham Hall, Woodford Green, where they discussed in detail the measures of organization which the Convention put into operation.

There were several familiar faces generally seen in the World's conventions which were missing at Geneva, notably that of the gentle and still beautiful Hannah Whitehall Smith, author of the Christian's Secret of a Happy Life. She welcomed everyone in London, but she says that years and increasing lameness are beginning to tell upon her, and she cannot go about the world as easily as in other days. Most of the delegates from countries where the native costume is still worn, appeared in it at Geneva upon special occasions, but European dress seemed to prevail. Miss Johannsdottir, the president of the Iceland W.C.T.U., however, wore her quaint head-dress and it gave a pleasing touch of picturesqueness to the platform. Miss Olive Malvery, the young Indian girl who has started journalism and lecturing in England, enlivened the programme several times with recitations, when she came out, in flowing graceful robes of brilliant yellow and gold.

The changes in the constitution were made at the first session of the executive committee. They put the election of officers into the hands of the Convention. Miss Anna Gordon gave notice that she, or some one in her place, would, at the next biennial convention, move to amend Article 8 of the constitution by submitting the word "nominated" for the word "elected," adding after the words "executive committee," the words "elected by the convention" and substituting the word "convention" for the words "executive committee" at the close of the article. The amendment was adopted, so that Article 8 reads now as follows:

The president, vice-president at large, secretary and treasurer, shall be nominated biennially by the executive committee and elected by the Convention, and the assistant secretary shall be nominated by the secretary and elected by the Convention.

It was carried that the constitution may now be altered or amended by a two-thirds vote of the executive committee, subject to the approval of the Convention, that the World's Convention may be called in two or in three years by the general officers, and that they may also have the power to decide the place of the Convention. It will thus be impossible to say where the next Convention will be held. Invitations were received from several countries, notably from Australia and Denmark; but the general feeling seemed to be that it would convene in Boston. This was the place of the first World's meeting and a fitting place for the next one, which many workers think should go to America.

The missionary work was also reorganized. With missionary stations now established in fifty-eight countries, the need at present is for resident members, instead of "Round-the-World Missionaries." There will hereafter be none so-called, but instead "World's White Ribbon Missionaries." Miss Jessie Ackermann sent in her resignation, having other duties at home to engage her attention, and the new workers in the foreign field are Miss Tinling of England, who has been doing excellent work recently in the United States, and Miss Johannsdottir of Iceland. Miss Northam Fields of Warren, Ill., who has been in New Mexico for some time, will be continued there. Miss Kara Smart of North Dakota, has been in Japan for six months, and her work is so satisfactory there that it will be continued.

The election of officers by a World's convention took place Thursday morning and no change was made. There was no opposition to any name presented for re-election. The only resignation among the superintendents was that of Mrs. Barnes, who has been so long at the head of the Young Women's work. Mrs. Clara Parrish Wright will have charge of the Y branch.

It would be impossible to give here in detail all the interesting facts brought out in the reports of the secretaries and superintendents. Miss Slack's report was naturally the most important, as it gave in detail the condition of the temperance movement in the United States, Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Canada, Queensland, Burma, India, Madagascar, Syria, Cape Colony, Natal, Chili, Cuba, Uruguay, and the West Indies.

The effect of this temperance convention upon Geneva would be a difficult matter to discuss off-hand. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the slow-going, conservative Swiss were thoroughly aroused. The Reunion des Femmes of Geneva gave the delegates a handsome reception on Tuesday, and the Swiss ladies committee arranged a banquet for Friday evening.

JUBILEE OF CANADIAN CONGREGATIONALISM

A MEMORABLE meeting of Canadian Congregationalists has just been held at London, Ontario, at which the Jubilee of the organization of the Union of Ontario and Quebec was celebrated. The occasion will be specially remembered by reason of the acceptance of a challenge from the Colonial Missionary Society of London, England, for the removal of the entire mortgage indebtedness of the churches. The origin of this movement was the visit of a deputation from the Union of England and Wales to Canada, last autumn, and the subsequent report that ten per cent. will be added to all sums collected for this purpose. The project was taken up with enthusiasm, and it is believed that the desired goal will be reached.

Another forward movement was made in relation to the great Northwest, by the appointment of a provisional superintendent, who shall seek to make arrangements with at least the Presbyterian and Methodist denominations, to prevent the rivalry and competition now so manifest in older communities, and to plan for a better service for the interests of the Kingdom of God. An effort will also be made to follow up the Congregational families coming from the United States and England, and place them in early church fellowship.

In this connection may be noted the cordial fraternal fellowship which was shown by representatives of the different denominations. Strong and influential delegations were officially received from the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, and their greetings cordially reciprocated.

The annual utterances from the chair, and the preacher of the Union, were both constructive, and covered somewhat similar ground, though this was unknown until after their delivery. The chairman's topic was "The Changing and the Abiding in Religious Thought and Life," and the preacher's was, "Christ, the Centre of Authority." Both speakers are young men, and are fairly representative of the thought of the Union. The other addresses dealt largely with evangelistic, educational, home and foreign missionary topics.

A pleasing feature of the gathering was the attention which was given to both young people and the veterans. The thought specially emphasized in connection with the former was the importance of guiding children in church and Christian life. The "Hour with Veterans" called up interesting reminiscences, and valuable lessons for the younger ministers. Among these were the power of prayer, and the value of personal and persistent work. Of the six veterans who spoke, some were past, and the others nearing, the fourscore milestone of life.

Among the more public considerations of the Union, was a strong resolution requesting the Ontario government to enact prohibitory legislation in accordance with the recent referendum vote. The Dominion government was earnestly petitioned to make similar enactments in connection with the manufacture and sale of the cigarette.

Altogether, the gathering marked an epoch in Canadian Congregationalism. Not a jarring word was heard from beginning to close, and the hope, expectation, and whole-hearted consecration augur well for the future.

HAPPY DAYS AT OUR FRESH-AIR HOME

THE DINNER HOUR UNDER THE BIG TENT AT MONT-LAWN

It was a very delightful Fourth of July which our little guests at Mont-Lawn passed this year. There were considerably over two hundred tenement children at our Fresh-Air Home, and besides these, Housemother Collins had a great number of visitors, who came by rail and boat, to see how the little folks celebrated.

What a pretty and picturesque sight it was, when the joyous youngsters marched across the road lawn, the boys' and from Mr. Devere's Abigail Kindergarten in New York, playing patriotic airs that woke the echoes of the Rockland Hills, and set the children wild with enthusiasm. For several years, the Abigail Mission Band has visited Mont-Lawn on the Fourth, and the Nyack villagers, and other folk from far and near, come to listen to the stirring music. No regimental band, playing before the grandest of audiences, ever received such unstinted homage of applause as those Kindergarten musicians.

Our programme for the children's celebration was a most attractive one, and fairly filled the day with enjoyment for our little guests, and for the visitors also. In the morning, after a breakfast, the order is to "trim house," which means to decorate the main building and its surroundings with gay red-white-and-blue bunting. Then after this was been satisfactorily accomplished, the early forenoon is devoted to frolic, the children being supplied with small torpedoes and firecrackers, which they explode with keenest enjoyment, making the place sound as though a battle with small arms was in progress. Dinner call is for twelve o'clock. A few minutes earlier, the wee folks are assembled by tap of drum, and they march in regular file, with military precision, to the great marquee tent, where, under the cool shade of double canvas, they enjoy a hearty dinner. Whatever else changes at Mont-Lawn, there is always absolute dependence to be placed upon the children being hungry at mealtimes. Their appetite never fails, and to watch them at meals is an exhilirating sight.

After dinner on every Independence Day comes the flag-raising, and then parade drill, both of which are greatly enjoyed both by the children and the visitors to Mont-Lawn. Then there is an hour's frolic around the May-pole, which is a focus of attraction to the youngsters, with its long streamers of vari-colored ribbon, and the swiftly moving children that gayly circle about it. Instead of being May, it is July, with midsummer approaching; but this trivial fact makes no difference to the little tenement waifs, whose merry dance around the May-pole is not affected by any considerations of time or seasons. Then, after the children have romped and frolicked out-of-doors to their hearts' content, everybody, visitors included, proceeds to the pretty little chapel, which is always decorated for the Fourth. Here the young folks, who have for days been preparing for the occasion, give a display of calisthenics, and then sing their patriotic songs. Many of the old favorites, "The Star-Spangled Banner," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "There are Many Flags in Many Lands," "The Stars and Stripes," are rendered by the children with a volume and vigor that would surprise most audiences.

At these Independence Day gatherings our children always look to some of our invited guests for a speech, and this year the programme included the names of Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, Mrs. Margaret Sangster, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, "Mother of the Bowery Boys," the Rev. Dr. Lee and Ichabod, of Peekskill, Mr. Irving Bachelor, the author of Eben Holden; the Rev. C. H. Mead, the evangelist Mr. Harry Steele Morrison, and others, as among those who would speak to the children briefly. They listened appreciatively to Miss Grace Hildebrand, "the Gospel Nightingale," while she sang to them. Dr. Klopsch is always in demand at every such gathering, and the wee guests are never fully satisfied until they have had a good talk from the founder of our Children's Home.

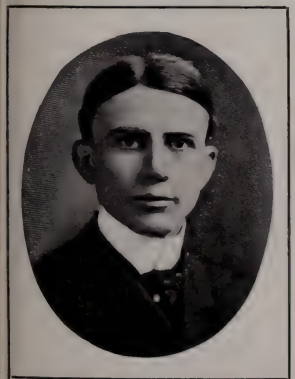
THE ABIGAIL KINDERGARTEN BAND AT MONT-LAWN

But with sunset comes the truest part of the day's enjoyment. Then the capital display of fireworks, which Dr. Klopsch gives to the Home every Independence Day evening, takes place. No tenement child at Mont-Lawn would dream of missing that. He or she would surrender everything else without a murmur—dinner, the songs, the romps, the swings, and even the ice-cream (which is served to children and guests alike, after "visitors tea")—rather than miss the beautiful spectacle which, once a year, makes the eastern slope of the big lawn a place to be remembered.

The fireworks can be seen for miles around, and they include Roman candles, balloons, skyrockets, wheels, red, blue and green lights, "mines," "flowerpots," and a variety of other pyrotechnics, the whole making a really fine spectacle, and exciting the most unbounded enthusiasm. This concludes the day's enjoyment. The visitors depart for their homes, and soon our little white cots are filled with sleeping children, dreaming over again, the never-to-be-forgotten joys of the Fourth at Mont-Lawn.

ENDEAVORERS AT DENVER

ELABORATE PREPARATIONS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION THIS WEEK



MR. VAN OGDEN VOGT, GEN. SEC'Y

THE day to which the Christian citizens of Denver Colo., have been looking forward for ten years past, will dawn soon after this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in the hands of its readers. As far back as 1892, Denver hospitably invited the chiefs of the United Society of Christian Endeavor to hold the annual Convention in that city. Year after year the invitation has been renewed, and all classes, and the State and City authorities cordially joined in pressing it. The Senate and Assembly of Colorado, and the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, took special action, so that the Society is sure of a hearty reception.

Although July 9 is the date set for the opening of the Convention, preparations have been going forward for many weeks, to insure the comfort and convenience of the thousands of delegates who are to attend. The site on which will be pitched the huge tent in which the chief meetings will be held, has been ploughed and rolled level. It is near the City Park, and is easy of access by the trolley cars. In the near neighborhood are churches of the Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist denominations, which will be used for overflow meetings. Twenty other churches have also been placed at the disposal of the Society, for use as headquarters for State conferences. Altogether, Denver has fulfilled royally its promises of hospitality.

The Convention is to be in session until July 13, and its programme shows that all that time will be needed for its business. Besides the ordinary features, including the report for the year and Dr. Clark's presidential address, both of which are anticipated with unusual interest, there will be a school of methods, which will be a centre of attraction to the delegates; pastors' conferences; missionary rallies, at which several eminent missionaries fresh from the foreign field will be present; evangelistic meetings led by Dr. R. A. Torrey; conferences on the Problems of the Times, led by Rev. R. J. Campbell, of London; and many other important meetings. Over one hundred speakers have been assigned to special topics. It is evident that the five days will be busy ones, and they are sure to be, as at previous Conventions, times of blessing.

A Distinguished Visitor

OUR readers will be pleased to greet, in the columns of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the great English divine, the Rev. Reginald J. Campbell. Mr. Campbell, who is not only the leading Congregationalist, but is also regarded as the very foremost exponent of practical Christianity in the English pulpit to-day, is bold and fearless in his utterance of spiritual truths, yet an exceedingly modest man withal. He comes here, not with a sound of official trumpets, nor in the spirit of criticism, nor as a teacher; but he is here, as he himself declares, on a purely fraternal visit, in which he expects to derive both pleasure and profit from association with our institutions and people. So distinguished a guest is worthy of a most cordial welcome.

If Mr. Campbell's preaching may be characterized at all, it must be by its simplicity and straightforwardness. His doctrine, if plain, is sweet and wholesome, and has the advantage of practical application. There are, however, occasions when this great preacher can tower and expand in righteous indignation, or rise to the loftiest realms of oratory; but these are rightly reserved for the occasions that demand such treatment. Many a weary soul will be helped and encouraged by the simple yet noble sermon from his pen, which we print in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

De-Christianizing the Schools

SPEECHES such as were made at the recent convention of the Orthodox Jewish Unions, of the United States and Canada, cause a genuine feeling of regret. In this Christian land—for it is everywhere acknowledged to be Christian—we have the broadest toleration for all religions: the Hebrew, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist and all others being left free to worship God, each in his own way. From immemorial days, the Bible has been read in our public schools, not for doctrine or interpretation, but for history and morals. No one has objected to the Old Testament, on the ground of its monotheistic teachings. It is a new development to find objection to the New Testament on the ground that it tells the story of Christ. This is the objection now urged by the infidels, the atheists, the agnostics, and, incidentally, by a few of the Hebrews themselves.

Our public schools are not in the business of making proselytes. Any teacher who so contravened the established rules by injecting interpretation or doctrine, would be dismissed, and deservedly so. Knowing this fact, and knowing also that the Bible is our nation's standard of morals, it is surprising that those who might be supposed to estimate America's religious toleration at its proper value, should themselves be found on the side of the intolerant. We have not asked them to give up the Talmud. Why should they now urge us to give up the Bible in our schools? It is a mistake for any one to suppose that a Jewish child, any more than a Catholic, or a Unitarian child, is endangered by the reading of the Bible in the schools. The religion we inherit from our fathers and mothers is not a thing to be lightly put on and off in this way.

We cannot believe that the objection to the Bible in the schools comes from the intelligent Hebrews. They value toleration too highly to become intolerant themselves. It is an ill-advised objection, because it antagonizes the independent spirit of the American people—that spirit of equality and fair-play, which is characteristic of us as a nation. We have taught from the Bible, in the schools, since the foundation of the Republic; and though there is in this country, probably as great a variety of religious creeds as can be found anywhere in the world, all are agreed that the effect of the moral teaching in the schools has been such as to produce a strong, earnest, truth-loving, upright people. When Queen Victoria was asked by a native Indian prince to reveal the secret of England's greatness, she pointed to the Bible, which had been for many generations a part of the British school curriculum. Yet England has, like ourselves, been tolerant of all creeds and religions, and to the Jew as largely as to the Gentile.

The sole object of reading from the Scriptures in our public schools is to promote the moral development of the children. Little enough of that kind of teaching is given in the public schools, considering how important it is. If the moral side of the child's character is neglected, he may grow up to be a criminal, and all the more dangerous a criminal because of the education he has received. It is therefore asking too much of us to demand that the book which contributes more than any other to moral development, should be excluded from the schools. The man who protests against the New Testament being read, is doing more mischief to the moral welfare of the rising generation than he is aware of. It will be a bad day for this country when the graduates from our public schools are a godless, conscienceless crowd of young men and women. There is nothing in the New Testament that can do a child any harm, but much that, if the child heeds the reading, will do him good. The hospitality so freely tendered to all races and religions in this country should not be abused by an attempt to dictate the kind of instruction that shall be given in our public schools, or to expect that our customs shall be changed to suit the prejudices of others.

Cash or Credit?

THE credit system in housekeeping offers the specious inducement that you may buy what you wish at the moment and settle the bill when it is presented. Unfortunately, it is not always either easy or convenient to pay the bill that has been rolling up week by week, or month by month, till the aggregate is a formidable sum total. The merchant who grants long credit practically owns the dilatory customer, who cannot go elsewhere and pay cash while he is bound to the store in which he has an account. Sleepless nights and shamed days, and income anticipated to the last dollar, are the heavy price paid for credit by people of limited means.

When one pays as one goes, or settles every housekeeping account weekly, one enjoys a delightful independence. Then, one's purse exercises a very salutary check on one's desires. Fancy groceries, daintily packed biscuits, conserves, and relishes, all sorts of little table luxuries that are nice but may be done without, are freely purchased when one is to pay on some distant and accommodating to-morrow, but are not so lavishly bought when it is a question of paying at once.

The woman who keeps her household expenses well within a comfortable margin, is usually the woman who runs up no bills, but pays grocer, butcher, milk-man, vegetable man and tradesman in general, as soon as he has left his wares on her kitchen table. One who compares the two systems in her own experience, if she belongs to the great host of people who must be economical if they would be honest, will never adopt credit in preference to cash in her domestic management.

A Slander Quickly Refuted

IN the Chicago Daily News of June 9th, there appeared an interview with G. K. Chetty, said to be a native noble and wealthy merchant of India, in the course of which he made serious charges against the Christian missionaries in India, and incidentally, against the government officials in that country. He said:

The people of India are constantly being misrepresented, and that by the Christian missionaries who come there under the guise of religion. The American people are kind and generous. We recognize their religious fervor and zeal, and the sublime sentiments which actuate Christian people in sending missionaries to our country, but let me say right here that they are wasting valuable energy and are misdirecting their efforts. My suggestion, and the suggestion of a majority of the people of India, is that instead of sending missionaries to our country to Christianize us, let the Christian people of this country and other lands send missionaries into Russia and other countries professing Christian religion, so that they would humanize these Christians.

We are exceedingly appreciative of the kind spirit shown by the people in gathering funds in this and other countries for the people who were starving in our country during the famine a few years ago, but we must also tell them that it did not reach the masses, and that it was not distributed in the spirit in which it was offered. The missions were made the avenues through which aid was given to the famine-stricken, but while no stipulation was made by the people who made the donations that the recipients must be Christians, the missionaries gave help only to Christians, or those who declared an intention of becoming Christians. Is that Christianlike or is it human?

Bishop J. M. Thoburn, Methodist Missionary Bishop of India and Chairman of the Interdenominational Missionary Committee (representing all the Protestant churches now operating in India and lately engaged in famine relief work), is now in this country on a brief visit. The leading representative of the American Protestant Church in India, Bishop Thoburn is held in the highest esteem by all classes, native and foreign alike, and he enjoys the fullest confidence of the Viceroy and government officials. No man in India possesses a more intimate knowledge of all that related to the great famine and the administration of relief work in the various provinces, the Bishop's committee having full control of all the funds contributed in America for relief work in India. Consequently, there is none so well qualified to reply to Mr. Chetty's charges. The following is the Bishop's answer:

MISREPRESENTATIONS CORRECTED

"My attention has been called to a statement which appeared recently in the Chicago Daily News, on the subject of missionary character, and the distribution of famine funds by missionaries in India, given on the authority of Mr. Chetty, of India.

"The whole statement is misleading, and parts of it deliberately and outrageously false. Mr. Chetty, who seems to be a native of India, has stated that the fund sent to India from America, for famine relief 'did not reach the masses, and was not distributed in the spirit in which it was offered.' He also says that 'the missionaries were made the avenues through which it was given to the famine-stricken.' This statement also is without foundation. The government of India organized a special service for the distribution of famine funds, and the work was superintended by able and conscientious officials. No inquiry was ever made concerning the religious faith of those receiving the aid. Missionaries were employed wherever possible to help in distributing famine relief, but they never made the slightest discrimination in feeding the hungry, and never asked a question concerning the religion of those receiving aid. Mr. Chetty has given utterance to a deliberate slander, not only upon missionaries, but upon the officials representing the British government in India.

"In view of these reckless misstatements made by Mr. Chetty, it may seem superfluous to pay any attention to his further charges. He can, no doubt, find persons in Chicago who will be willing to listen to him when he states that the efforts of missionaries in India are misdirected, but any child will be able to perceive that the witness is by no means free from prejudice. Who and what Mr. Chetty is I have no means of knowing, but it can only reflect honor upon missionaries in India to have a man who can make misstatements so recklessly speak in their disfavor. Men of his kind know nothing whatever of missionaries or of their work. His charge that the people of India are misrepresented by the missionaries is not supported by a word of proof. These gentlemen publish papers and other periodicals; they have published many books; they write freely to the press both in Europe and America; yet no one has objected that their statements do not harmonize with the average reports which are received through other sources. The missionaries of India, and of the world, have an unchallenged character, not only for veracity in general, but for accuracy in all their published statements.

"It may seem to some readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that an apology is due them for occupying so much space in replying to a witness whose testimony is manifestly false; but strangers like Mr. Chetty, who come from a strange land, sometimes find it easy to obtain an audience; and the simple fact that they are strangers, has a tendency to secure for them a more favorable hearing than they would otherwise receive. For this reason alone, I have thought it worth while to give an emphatic denial to the above charges, and to assure the public that the most rigid official supervision was observed all through the distressing period of the late famine. J. M. THOBURN."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Wonders of Radium

MORE astonishing discoveries than those made by Professor and Madame Curie, by Becquerel and other scientists, the world has not known for many a year. The Roentgen rays, which could pass through wood, leather, and other opaque substances, were the pioneers in this field, but now the clue thus given, has been followed, until new elements have been discovered, and science has to readjust theories which hitherto have been regarded as incontestable. When Peligot, in 1840, succeeded in extracting from pitchblende the new metal, to which Klaproth, its discoverer, gave the name of uranium, no one had any idea of all the qualities it possessed. It was recently discovered that it emitted rays very like the Roentgen rays, and that it formed part of many metals. In seeking to discover it in various substances, Professor Curie and his wife found that in many minerals which contained uranium, there was some unknown substance more active than uranium itself. They chose pitchblende to experiment upon. Separating it into minute portions, and analyzing them, they came upon an intensely radioactive substance, to which they gave the name of polonium, in honor of their Polish nationality; and another substance, almost as active, to which they gave the name of radium.

It was found that rays, having all the effects produced artificially by the Roentgen apparatus, were given out spontaneously by radium, and these were more powerful a hundred thousand times than those given out by uranium. Small quantities of radium were lent by the Curies to Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver D. Dodge, and other scientists, for purposes of experiment, and they are all puzzled and astonished at its qualities. By the light emitted from it, photographs can be taken as with the Roentgen rays, and the photographs show the bones in the hand, or the coins in a pocketbook. In the photograph (No. 2) of pitchblende, containing radium, on this page, the light emitted from it can be clearly seen. The rays also act on other substances, for when a piece of platinum was placed near the radium, in a dark room, the platinum immediately shone with a bright, greenish light. Its effects on the human body are also very marked. Sir William Crookes put a small quantity of radium in a brass cylinder, which he put in his pocket to take to a meeting of scientists. On his return, he found a blister on his side opposite the pocket in which he had carried the radium. Subsequently, not being sure that the radium had produced the blister, he touched his bare arm with the substance. A sore resulted, which took weeks to heal, the mischief having penetrated the flesh so deeply.

The astonishing feature of radium is that in spite of its enormous activity, which is in the form of minute corpuscles thrown off at the speed of 120,000 miles a second, it does not appreciably diminish in substance. This suggests the possibility that, at last, the long-sought agent which will give light without heat, or combustion, has been found. The discoverers say, however, that radium is extremely rare. It takes enormous quantities of pitchblende to yield a minute quantity of radium. At present, a piece of radium a seventieth part of a grain in weight, costs two dollars; so that a pound, if it could be had, would be worth nearly a million dollars. Sir William Crookes closes his account of the metal by saying: "The phenomena of radium require us to recast many of our ideas of matter, electricity, and energy, and its discovery promises to realize what, for the last hundred years, have been but day-dreams of philosophy." It is not the first time by many that science has had to "recast its ideas," and has had to admit that it was mistaken in the matters of which it was quite sure. Remembering this fact, Christians who have been distressed by hearing that science contradicts revelation, may be encouraged to hold fast their faith in Him who has said:

I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things that are not yet done (Isa. 46:9, 10).

Lost for Dress

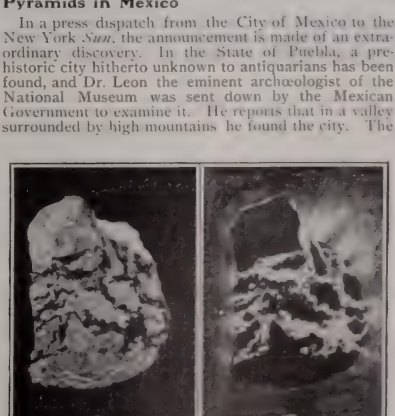
A curious story connected with the assassination of the King and Queen of Servia comes from Belgrade. A friend of the late Queen Draga says that the royal pair received warning several days before the outbreak that a dangerous plot was being organized, and that their lives were in imminent danger. They determined to seek safety in flight, and there were no difficulties in the way. The King accordingly seized all the available funds in the treasury, and remitted them to a friend in England for safe investment. He was then eager to leave immediately, but Queen Draga urged delay. She expected a consignment of beautiful dresses from Paris. One costume especially she wanted, as it was a rich traveling dress, and would be particularly becoming for her to wear on her journey. The goods were already on the way to Belgrade, and the Queen was waiting only for their arrival, and then she and her husband would flee. But before the parcel came, the plot matured, and both were slain. In that terrible hour, when the murderers broke into the palace, how the vain Queen must have deplored allowing considerations of dress to delay her flight. She must have realized then, as many will do at the last, that the love of finery may entail a fearful cost.

The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment (Luke 12: 23).

Pyramids in Mexico

In a press dispatch from the City of Mexico to the New York Sun, the announcement is made of an extraordinary discovery. In the State of Puebla, a prehistoric city hitherto unknown to antiquarians has been found, and Dr. Leon the eminent archæologist of the National Museum was sent down by the Mexican Government to examine it. He reports that in a valley surrounded by high mountains he found the city. The ruins consist of a series of pyramids guarded by elaborate trenches and connected, for purposes of communication, by wide avenues, which were cut at intervals by sloping accliviti[illegible], platforms and staircases. All the pyramids were found to be quadrangular, and to have been built with special reference to the cardinal points of the compass. They were constructed entirely of rocks and subsoil cut and laid in juxtaposition, with a surface dressing of small stones worked into cubical forms of very ornamental appearance and laid close together. Great walls with bases much wider than their summits reinforce the pyramids, the tops of which are so wide as to be really streets. On one of the highest of the platforms and at the base of all the pyramids, we found pieces of pottery which were certainly made before the time of Columbus, and which were evidently the remains of a civilization relatively more advanced than that of the builders of the pyramids. We found also many sculptured stones in bas-relief of prehistoric times. Figures of human beings and animals in stone and iron were numerous. Domestic utensils of stone painted rose color were scattered over the ground. Leagues of the mountainous country are covered with ruins. It is strange that we should know nothing of the existence of a people so highly civilized as to erect such edifices. Their very name is forgotten, though in one sense the Scripture has in their case been fulfilled:

Thou inward thought, that their house shall continue for ever, and their dwelling place to all generations; but man abideth not in honor (Ps. 49: 11 R.V.).



RADIUM (I) IN THE LIGHT (II) IN DARKNESS

A Crook's Self-Sacrifice

A dramatic story of heroism, is told by the Daily Times, of Los Angeles, Cal. It says that two men were caught recently in a crafty plot to defraud an old man of his property. They realized when they were arrested, that the evidence against them was conclusive. The police did not know how strong a case they had, but the prisoners were aware that it would come out before the trial. Bail was fixed at two thousand dollars each. One of the prisoners was a young man, while the other was far advanced in life. The younger man, had twelve hundred dollars in all at command. The elder, about a thousand. "There is not enough for us both," said the younger man. "But it is no use for us both to go to prison for three years. I will let you have a thousand dollars, and that will enable you to put up the bail for yourself. Then you can skip, and I will stay and face the music." The elder man protested against deserting his companion, but the other insisted. "You would die before your sentence ran out," he said, "while I could bear it." Finally, it was so settled. The elder man left for parts unknown, while the younger man, having given up his money, has gone to prison for three years. It is strange that a man capable of such self-sacrifice should be a criminal. What a pity that a nature so fine should be spoiled by yielding to evil propensities! If he would only take advice of the apostle, he might be saved.

If a man purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honor, prepared unto every good work (II. Timothy 2: 21).

BRIEF NOTES

A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized at Saloniki (The ancient Thessalonica, where Paul taught and to which he wrote his two epistles to the Thessalonians). It has [illegible] members.

Dr. N. D. Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, has become an ardent advocate of Federation of Churches and of cooperation in Christian work. He said in a recent sermon that millions of dollars have been wasted in small towns and villages through denominational rivalry in the organization of useless churches.

The Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, announces lectures by Prof. R. K. Orr, of Knoxville, Dr. Dr. Francis Hoyt, of Toronto, and Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, Mass. Dr. R. A. Torrey has returned from his round the world tour, and will preside at the Convention of Christian Workers to be held from [illegible] at the Tabernacle.

The oldest living Baptist minister in the world is said to be Rev. John Aves, who has just celebrated his ninety-[illegible] birthday. Born in Cornwall, England, in 1808, he was [illegible] baptized by Robert Hall, the famous preacher, and ordained [illegible] he was about 21 years of age. Samuel's Farewell Address

A Grand Old Man

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 19
I. SAMUEL 12: 13-25

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--I. SAMUEL 12: 24:
ONLY FEAR THE LORD AND SERVE HIM IN TRUTH WITH ALL YOUR HEART

ISRAEL'S "Grand Old Man!" Such was Samuel at seventy years of age, as he stood before the assembled congregation of Israel at Gilgal, to give them his farewell address. Not that he expected soon to die—he did not till more than ten years after this event—but the time had come for the judge to give place to the new king. What kind of a judge had Samuel been? One who dared, looking back on a long career, to throw out the challenge to the assembled multitude: "I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. Behold, here I am, witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed (the king), whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it you." Such an upright judge was he recognized to be, that with one voice the people exclaimed: "Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." And Samuel called for the sign and seal to be put upon this testimony, when he said: "The Lord is witness;" which the people completed by saying: "He is witness."

Was the ex-judge now to turn his back upon the people whom he had so long borne upon his heart? No, for while he was no longer to be judge, he was still to be the Lord's prophet among them, and in that relation he said to the people: "God forbid, that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you, but I will teach you the good and the right way." And, immediately he proceeded to do it, when, even in the presence of King Saul himself, he upbraided the people yet again for their wickedness in asking for a king, and cited from their past history the danger of thus setting God aside. But Samuel's words were seasoned with mercy, as he set before the king and the people the duty of obedience to God. And again Samuel called upon God to be a witness to the truth spoken. And God's "hand and seal" were shown in the thunder and rain that followed. The people were greatly impressed by this, because it was at the time of wheat harvest, when rain was almost unknown. It was as disastrous as it was unusual, for the labor of months was destroyed in an hour's time. The miracle thus served a double purpose: showing God's acquiescence in what Samuel had spoken, and picturing the evil results of sin, for, said Samuel: "If ye shall still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed; both ye and your king."

Illustration and Application

Samuel's active and useful old age brings us, in midsummer, lessons for life's autumn and springtime, on "bringing forth fruit in old age," (Psa. 92: 14), with which should be associated another text, golden with harvest truths, for those in life's springtime especially: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Let us then consider: first, how those who are in life's autumn, may continue fruitful to the last; and, second, how those who are yet in life's spring or summer, may insure "the joy of harvest" in old age.

I. In the early centuries of human history it was as common to live into the second century, as it is now to live into the second half century (Gen. 5), suggesting that but for sin, man in his human body might be as immortal on the old earth, as he is to be in his resurrection body in the "new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

The Psalmist, in days of luxury and dissipation, when men were digging their graves with their teeth, and weaving their shrouds with the swift shuttles of passion, spoke of seventy as the usual limit of life; with fourscore as only an undesirable addition of "labor and sorrow." But even to-day, when all of us start in the springtime, handicapped with thistle seeds of heredity, the "inbred sin" which science as well as theology proclaims, three score years and ten is by no means the limit of a well-ordered life or even of its fruitfulness—much less is there any reason in the modern phrase, "the dead line of fifty." Lazy men and women often go to seed long before that; but public and private life both attest by many examples that one may do his best work for the world, after fifty. As we have said before, the secret of success in life's second half century, is in retaining the hopefulness, enthusiasm and energy of youth, while adding the maturity and wisdom of age—the heart of fire under the locks of snow.

For young and old alike it is important to extend the horizon of possible life. "A short life and a happy one" is a "doctrine of devils." The very sins that shorten life, also sadden and sodden it. Nor is there any healthy virtue in a good man wishing to die before he is called. It is like the "clock watcher" longing for his wages before his day's work is over. Let our motto be, "A useful life and a long one." The usefulness will take care of the happiness, while prolonging as well as deepening life. What is the literal "dead line" in modern life—the line beyond which no modern has ever lived? We read not infrequently of five generations; a hundred or more people gathering to honor the hundredth birthday, or the 102d, or 103d, or 104th, of a healthy and happy great-great grandmother—seldom of a great grandfather. But that is not the "dead line." According to the census, there were in the United States in 1880, 4,016 persons one hundred or more years of age, and 3,981 in 1890-92 in London at same time. Servian statistics for 1897 give 290 persons from

We Might Live Twice 70 Years

"IF YE SHALL STILL DO WICKEDLY, YE SHALL BE CONSUMED, BOTH YE AND YOUR KING"

105 to 115; 123 from 115 to 125; 18 from 126 to 135, and 3 from 135 to 140. It is said that monks of Mt. Athos have lived beyond 150.

Here then is the "dead line," to which right living for generations might extend a healthful, useful life. See Revue d' Economie Politique, 1902, article by M. Jeane Finot, whose special point is that we should fear the fear of death, not death itself, since it is this fear chiefly that cuts off old age, as he claims. And here we must not fail to note that only faith can cast out that fear. The Christian who neither hastens to, nor shrinks from the goal, is the one whose steady tread shall make his old age most lasting and most useful. And here, too, we should pause to consider, not as a fear, but a fact, to be prepared for, that, while even the old may live long, even the young may die soon.

Many years ago a large company of rich and influential men were gathered together in a magnificent French castle. They had met to partake of a grand banquet given by the Chevalier Gerard de Kampis, in honor of the completion of the lordly building.

Eloquent speeches were made congratulating the host, and telling him that he was the most fortunate of men. One guest made quite a sensation by saying, "Sir Knight, I felicitate you upon your good fortune and beautiful new home, but in order that your happiness may be complete, you require one thing." "What may that be?" inquired the Chevalier. "One of your doors must be well walled up," replied his visitor decidedly.

All eyes turned to the speaker. With a puzzled air, his host asked, "Of which door do you speak, my friend?"

And his guest answered quietly, "The door through which you will one day be carried, when you have to leave all these riches and treasures and go to your grave." The speech greatly struck both host and guests. The Chevalier could not forget it, and through it God taught him the vanity of all earthly things. Very simply he came to the Saviour for the gift of eternal life, and then rejoiced to be able to use his great wealth in his service. But the main appeal of this lesson on Samuel's fruitful old age is not, "Be a Christian because you may soon die," but rather be a Christian because you may live long, and because only a Christian old age can be Serene and bright,

And lovely as a Lapland night.

But now, having shown that a modern life may be long, let us turn to history to show that life beyond fifty, beyond seventy, may and should be "fruitful." One who can do so may well "retire from business" at fifty or beyond, but it should be only as Samuel changed his activities from those of judge to those of prophet. Let as give up if we can the pursuit of gain, but devote equally strenuous efforts to the service of the public in the church, or in Christian politics, or in charities, or reforms, in all of which business talents are greatly needed. "Better to wear out than to rust out." Only let men begin ea preparation for such a change to higher act ities by cultivating capacity for other thin than money making. Ole Bull and Ericss were friends in early life, and met again aft both had achieved fame, one with his viol the other with his Monitor. Ole Bull repe edly invited his friend to his concerts, but t machinist always declined, on the ground th he had no time to waste on music. Ole Bu wondered what effect music would have the machine-like mind of his friend, and one day took his violin with him when he vi ited Ericsson in his shop. He paid no he to a displeased look in the latter's face, b spoke of some defects in his instrument an his wish to get a mechanic's advice. H took off the strings of the violin, asked abou the acoustic properties in certain wood passed on to a mechanical discussion sound waves, and then to illustrate his mean ing replaced the strings, played a few chord and passed into a rich melody. The work men laid down their tools and listened i silent wonder. When he ceased, Ericsso raised his bowed head and with moist eye said, "Do not stop. Go on! Go on! I neve knew until now what was lacking in my life.' Many a merchant, giving his ears only to th clink of money, for the sake of his love ones, then for the sake of money and busi ness success, needs more music, more books more home love, more prayer, more public spirit in his life now, even while he must give his main efforts to business, if only to create a capacity for nobler activities when the time shall come to give up business and retire up stairs into exclusive devotion to brotherhood's higher duties. Let us, in any case, "live while we live," even if, like Samuel, we brave a decade beyond the three score and ten. In a Western State a holiday was given in the capital to the people over seventy. More than 1,100 accepted the free tickets that brought them to this deserved reward, and enjoyed the free entertainment for body and mind that gave further honor to their achievement. Those in the seventies wore a red badge, the octogenarians blue, and a dozen beyond ninety white rosettes upon their breasts—two of them almost at the century mark.

II. And now let the young, most of all, remember that in order to live long we must begin early to live right. There are some wicked old men, whose hoary heads are not a crown of glory, because not found in the way of righteousness, but the rule holds good, despite the exceptions, "the wicked shall not live out half their days." It is virtue that bears in one hand "length of days," and in the other, "riches and honor." "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." He who sows gluttony and intemperance, and envy and hatred, and jealousy and ambition will not usually reap a strong life or a long one.

How Youth Affects Age

Let us put in contrast two life harvests, one of Talleyrand, who had built up a great outward fame, but not a noble inward character, who said at last, when death confronted him: "Behold eighty-three years passed away! What cares! What agitation! What anxieties! What ill-will! What sad complication! And all without results, except great fatigue of mind and body, and a profound sentiment of discouragement with regard to the future, and disgust with regard to the past."

In contrast look at Cornaro, at 83, congratulating himself that in all probability he "had still a series of years to live in health and spirits and to enjoy this beautiful world, which is indeed beautiful to those who know how to make it so." Even at 95 he wrote of himself as "sound and hearty, contented and cheerful." "At this age," he says, "I enjoy at once two lives: One terrestrial, which I possess in fact; the other celestial, which I possess in thought, and this thought is equal to actual enjoyment, when founded on things we are sure to attain, as I am sure to attain that celestial life, through the infinite mercy and goodness of God."

The glory of our life below
Comes not from what we do, or what we know
But dwells for evermore in what we are.
There is an architecture grander far
Than all the fortresses of war,
More inextinguishably bright
Than learning's lonely towers of light.
Framing its walls of faith and hope and love
In deathless souls of men, it lifts above
The frailty of our earthly home
An everlasting dome;
The sanctuary of the human host,
The temple of the Holy Ghost.

Shall We Teach Our Boys to Fight?

MOTHERS have, with few exceptions, very pronounced objections to allowing their boys to fight. A boy with disordered clothing and swollen features; eyes blackened, nose bleeding, and face distorted with anger, is not a pleasing object. Except when absolutely forced to fight in defence of a tormented animal, or a persecuted smaller boy, most mothers prefer to have peaceable sons, who will not engage in fisticuffs. Fathers, on the contrary, are apt to inculcate pugnacity; to wish their boys success in fights, and to teach them that standing up for their own rights is both necessary and manly. Nine Christian men out of every ten, do not hesitate to go in direct opposition to the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, which they affirm to be inadequate to the needs of the Twentieth Century.

Jesus said—and who shall dare declare that he said it only for grown men:

But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other, also. Whosoever shall compel thee to go with him a mile, go with him twain.

This principle of non-resistance does not imply cowardice. It is often the bully who fights, and it takes more courage to be self-controlled in the face of insult, than to be vindictive. The lad who learns to restrain a quick temper; to keep back angry words; to go through life without strife and battles, is, all things considered, a finer lad than the other who is always spoiling for a fight.

A symposium of prominent educators has lately been published in the Lend a Hand Record, and the views of the men contributing to it are somewhat interesting. Mr. Arthur D. Call, of Ansonia, commenting on an article by Mr. Wm. B. Forbush, in which the latter made some strong points in favor of fighting, says in part:

Of course there is a kind of non-resistance which is spineless, cowardly and despicable; but, on the other hand, there is a non-resistance, which, though crucified on the cross, will drive all enemies to rout. This last kind of non-resistance is farthest removed from selfishness. It is Christ-like, and school children need much to know of it. The boys whom I know, have, I believe, stood more in need of this last ethical concept, than of the doctrine of struggle. Most boys are too combative against each other, rather than too meek. The forces of combat among boys should be directed and encouraged, not against each other, but toward the ideals of virtue which hold society together. To say that non-resistance is selfish, is to utter both truth and error. All depends on what we mean by non-resistance.

Neither do I believe that a fight is necessary before two boys can become friends. Indeed, my feeling is that boys do not readily get over the hate generated out of a fistic encounter. Friendship which grows out of a fight, is usually of a master-and-slave sort, unwholesome as it is unnatural. Dr. Forbush's statement that a fight clears the atmosphere, is a subtle morsel of psychology quite beyond me. The fights in which I participated when a boy, rather loaded the air with much darkness. I recall at this moment that boy who thrashed me when I was eight years old, and I long to meet him, even now, just to see if I could not show him a thing or two. Either Dr. Forbush's boys must play at fight, else fighting has changed since I was a boy.

Again, my instincts forbid me to think that boys are better friends than girls. Do not college girls retain their friendships longer than college boys? I am sure that the little boys under my charge seem no nearer to each other than do the little girls.

Further, while some fighting may lead to some kinds of self-control, for the most part, I believe, it leads to an absence of self-control. And I cannot quite harmonize the confession that the only good instinct is a controlled instinct, with the statement that fighting strengthens the will.

Mr. W. M. F. Round says this:

Once in my life I have seen this nation stirred from east to west, and from north to south, with a common impulse against a common enemy, and I have seen the young and old rise up to defend a principle for which our fathers fought and died, and which generations of our ancestors have embalmed and enshrined as a most precious heritage. That kind of fighting that makes the fingers tingle at the thought of wrong done or injury inflicted, is allowable enough. To the large number of boys who have been under my control and direction, I have said, "There are three things for which you need not stay your fists. You may fight in the defence of women and children; you may fight if any slight or injury or harm is offered to either." I have taken the boys out on the campus, and pointed them to the Stars and Stripes that floated over our heads, and I have said that if any man be base enough to rise up and insult that and that for which it stands, and your country is in danger or the principles which underlie your country's welfare are touched, put into your heart all the spirit of your being, and ground and fight with your drop. And to this I would add that you may resent promptly, and with blows, if need be, any affack touching the bad spirit your own personal purity and virtue. And I have seen that the boys who understood this best were not the boys who, with scornful lip curlings of their physical power, went around with an imaginary chip on their shoulder ready to fight and lick any fellow that came in their way, and who fought for the lust of conquest and the lust of blood, and were never so happy as when they inflicted pain upon those who were physically their inferiors.

This question is one of vital concern to parents and teachers, and to the new generation. We shall be glad to hear from our readers, what they think and feel on the subject. We want our boys to be manly. What is the best way to make them so?

Women Punished for Swearing

In the old Puritan annals women were sometimes punished by magistrates for scolding, but never was a woman so much as accused of swearing. Not long ago, however, a Brooklyn judge sent two female culprits to prison for sixty days because they had used profane language to emphasize a quarrel in a public place. One of the women was married, but her husband interceded for her in vain. She had to go to jail. That profanity is rampant no one can doubt who hears young lads taking God's name in vain, and shudders at the language glibly uttered in many a light conversation; but women are not generally the most conspicuous sinners in this regard. Even very ignorant and coarse women usually refrain from this sin of the tongue. It is to be hoped that the companions of these women who have been thus publicly punished will take warning by their example, and learn that the way of the transgressor is hard. But why should not others, better taught, more refined, more sheltered, who habitually exclaim 'Heavens!' Goodness! Gracious! Mercy on me! Landsakes! and the like, correct their speech, take notice that expletives weaken rather than strengthen a statement, and, in brief, reform their modes of utterance where there is reason to do so.

READING THE BIBLE

The precious Word, oh! read it out, that we may hear the Master say,
Dear children, I am with you yet; I walk before you all the way.

CHILDHOOD'S PRAYERS

A SLEEP POTION

Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take,
And this I ask for Jesus' sake.
Amen!

A DAY TONIC

Now I raise me up to go:
I pray thee, Lord, my way to show.
If I should die before the night,
O guide me to eternal light.
And this I ask in Jesus' might.
Amen!

A Corner on Spiders

PUPPIES and kittens are born blind, and do not get their eyes fully open for about two weeks; but when they do, they appear to have a preternatural vision, which is a mystery to humans.

Mankind, or childkind, is born apparently with full-fledged powers of inward and outward vision, and yet is about the blindest of created life.

For years, I remember often passing through an outside doorway, just about high enough for a tall person to catch into a spider web, elaborately woven across the top corner, and if spun low, would be apt to decorate my nose, or eyes, or mouth; and yet, in all of that time I really did not pay much attention to it, but thoughtlessly brushed aside the web from myself, or occasionally stopped and annihilated it, forever as I thought, but only to find a new one the next morning, as fresh and radiant in the sunbeams as ever. Yet I would frequently pause and wonder at it, in all its prismatic glory, when fastened out to a wire and strung with beautiful dainty dew pearls, and I would have a feeling of sympathy for the poor spider's industry, and when it did not interfere with my comfort I would let it remain—for that was its way of making a living—until it became unsightly with the dead remainsof its yictims. So the spider waxed fat and prospered.

One morning I was going through the doorway, a great aloof spider was repairing its damaged web; I caught sight of one the beautiful things spun suddenly down on my hand, that had so often befriended it, and maliciously stung it. Then I was angered and killed my enemy, but for some days I had a swollen, painful hand to care for. Not till I was myself wounded did I declare war on all cotton spiders, and began to get my eyes open to the possibilities in spiders. No matter about brushing the web away, or even in hunting out the hidden spider and killing it; the web was again always there, nearly every morning waiting for the unwary fly. Some other observant of the old spider had seen that good corner stand and set up in business. Then I looked over the locality, and concluded that to get rid of the ever resentful spider, I must raid the entire surroundings, and keep my eyes ever open alert and vigilant. That's my little story. See the point?

"Oh yes," says the corner loafer, with his hands in his empty pockets, "It begins to dawn on my mental vision—some folks can't never see anything till they are hit by it."

HELEN BURT.

Cash or Credit

Unless one has a bank account like Fortunatus' purse, one would better not buy goods on credit. The system is most enticing, when the merchant, genial and debonair, offers you his goods, and payment is some weeks or months distant, when you are perfectly certain your empty pocket book will bulge with bills, and your ships at sea come sailing joyously into harbor. Vain delusion. The weeks slip by like lambs coming down hill. Your ships are not in port—they are out on the high seas, storm tossed, if they have not gone to the bottom. Your purse is meagre to famine, and the bills come in. Pay them you must, if you can. If you cannot, you lie awake nights, and are cross to the children in the morning. You tremble when the door bell rings, dreading a collector. You grow familiar with duns, from the polite reminder to the variety that knocks you down with a club. Poor people have no right to honor or honesty, to buy goods on credit. Cash is their safeguard and stronghold.

The Top Drawer

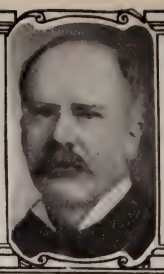
This bit is to be skipped by the orderly woman, whose top drawer is never in heaps, who keeps her ribbons and laces and collars and neckwear, and pins and studs, and breastpins and cuff buttons, and cologne and soap, and hose and small things in general, in perfect, beautiful and praiseworthy neatness.

Sister dear, whose top drawer is a scene of confusion and creature complaints, you may take this paragraph to yourself. It isn't worth while to advise you to reform, but you probably won't. But here is a caution: Never go away on a journey, however short, leaving any drawer—top, bottom, or in the middle—in a state that will mortify you if you come home maimed by an accident, or needing a surgeon in a hurry, if you happen to die suddenly. In view of possible catastrophes, we, who are not models of tidiness, should improve the shining hour and rearrange our desks and drawers while we may.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "In His Steps."



CHAPTER II.

"DO YOU mean to say, Mr. Douglas, that you absolutely refuse our offer?"

The Mayor had been very red in the face from the heat. There was an additional redness now, and an additional sharpness in his tone.

"I do. I have bought the paper with the purpose of conducting it along the line mapped out, and I don't care to sell."

"Then all I have to say is this; you're a fool!"

"Is that all you have to say? If so, I'll resume my work. Good day, gentlemen."

Douglas turned around to the desk and began to write. The Mayor glared at the quiet figure by the desk, and for a moment seemed undecided. Then he uttered a short laugh and said: "Beg pardon, Mr. Douglas. I regret my words. I spoke in haste."

"I accept your apology, sir," replied Douglas, coolly. He turned from his desk and faced his visitors again. The Mayor waited as if he had expected something more, but Douglas was silent.

"Fact is, I feel disappointed at your refusal. You see, Cleary almost the same as closed a deal with me before I went away. Naturally, I feel sore to find you in possession, and I am honestly giving you my opinion when I say that no such policy as you have mapped out can ever go here in this county. The people are for license here. The merchants, with the possible exception of Mr. Edwards, look on the saloon as a necessity to trade. It is a moral certainty that you cannot get advertising if you come out against the saloon, as you propose to do. The other things you mention are not so important, although, to my mind, you will run up against all sorts of opposition with some of them."

The Mayor paused, but Douglas did not say anything, and after an awkward moment the Mayor went on. As he talked he narrowly eyed Douglas, as if uncertain to a large degree concerning his attitude. "If you won't sell, Mr. Douglas, how would you consider this proposition. It's no secret, of course, that we are committed to Grayson in this county for Governor. But Anderson county is split on county officers, and, with the Beacon on an independent basis such as you propose, it is doubtful if we can elect Canning for county attorney." (The Mayor was feeling his way cautiously, but he went on boldly, with the assumption that every other man in business had his price.) "If you would swing the influence of the Beacon for the election of Canning and let the saloon question rest until fall, the committee will see to it that the subscription list of the Beacon is doubled or trebled inside of a month. This will mean, putting the paper on a solid basis for you, and you need not fear concerning lack of advertising."

Douglas looked at the Mayor.

"Is Mr. Canning a temperance man?"

"He's all right," spoke up Mr. Trask.

"Isn't it a fact that Mr. Canning has been on the side of the liquor men all he has dared, in cases which have come before him in his first term as county attorney? Isn't it a fact that the liquor men are giving him their hearty support in this campaign?"

Copyright, 1903, by Charles M. Sheldon

"What do you know about it?" exclaimed the Mayor with an oath.

"I am not quite as ignorant of the politics in Anderson county as you may think. At any rate, I know enough of the facts of Mr. Canning's record to say this. I not only will not swing the influence of the Beacon for the election of Canning, but I will use every influence I possess in the paper and out of it to defeat him."

The Mayor got up on his feet and his passion found expression in his face and manner.

"You'll regret this! You've had a fair offer and it's the last one you'll get. Mark my words, sir"—the Mayor started for the door, Mr. Trask and Mr. Reed preceding him, "mark my words, you're up against a hard proposition. Reform Colby! Reform Anderson county! Bah! After you have lived here as long as I have you'll find things can't be reformed quite so easy. Hang the reform business, any way! You'll get your fill of it, young man, before you're through!"

The Mayor stopped for a moment near the door, but Douglas did not offer to say anything, and the three men went out.

The editor of the Colby Beacon sat at his desk thoughtfully. He was not ignorant of the fact that he had thrown down the gage of war to the Mayor of Colby and to that part of the party which he represented.

But he was making history fast, especially his own, and the rapidity of his development was only a mark of his personality. All through his college course, while living on one dollar a week and teaching night school, he had grimly held on, even though at one time it had seemed to him that he might have to drop out for fear of a physical breakdown. He lost twenty pounds and sewed the buttons on his overcoat about two inches farther away from the button holes; but he never said a word to anybody, and the discouragement of his struggle had never affected his steady cheerfulness.

He drew a piece of paper toward him and began to write. The hot sun poured through the window close by the desk and reminded him of the need of a curtain there sometime.

"It would have been cheaper if I had let the dirt stay on," he said to himself, as he got up and pinned a piece of wrapping paper over the lower sash. Then he resumed his writing, and when he had finished he read aloud, in a low voice, what he had written.

Concerning the County Attorney

"From reliable sources, the editor of the Beacon is informed that the nominee for re-election to the office of county attorney, Mr. R. J. Canning, is receiving the united support of the whiskey element of Colby and of Anderson county. The Beacon stands squarely on its anti-saloon policy as clearly declared in another column, and it will never support Mr. Canning or any other candidate for public office who is in favor of the liquor interest. If the friends of law and order in this county will get together on an independent basis such as you propose, it is doubtful if we can elect Canning for county attorney, the Beacon will give such a candidate its heartiest support."

"The Mayor's visit gave me a subject for an editorial any way," said Douglas, as he stuck the article on a hook. "'For this relief, much thanks,' as Mr. Shakespeare says."

Just then his assistant and the boy came in with the casting for the paper trimmer. He helped them put it in place, and by the time the work was done, it was time to close the office and go to supper. The assistant and the boy had gone out and Douglas had shut his desk and was turning to go, when Mr. Edwards stepped in.

"How are you getting on? Better come home to supper with me. You look as if the board at Mrs. Wycoff's was too rich for you."

"I don't know about that," Douglas replied with a laugh. "I'm not dressed to go into company," he hesitated.

"Oh, never mind that. Mrs. Edwards and I are plain people. You need a little change, and besides, I want to talk with you about the Beacon."

Douglas gratefully accepted the informal invitation, and when he found himself seated at the table in the Edwards' house, with the kindly, motherly face of Mrs. Edwards beaming on him as if he were an old acquaintance, he felt very much at home, and allowed himself a moment of satisfaction at the thought of such friends for the brief experience at the boarding-house had been of the homesick kind and would have been more so if the work of the office had not kept him so tired and so busy. Yet no one, himself least of all, could realize what that plain, simple, hearty acquaintance with the Colby merchant was going to mean to the editor of the Beacon in the future.

"Let's see. When do you go to press? Take another biscuit. We've got a plenty of them, haven't we, Julia?"

"Yes, plenty. Take another, Mr. Douglas," Mrs. Edwards exclaimed heartily, while Edwards winked at Douglas and seemed to enjoy his confusion.

"Thank you. They taste very nice." Douglas blushed and took a biscuit. "My work has made me unusually hungry."

"May be that the fare at the Wycoff's is like number 7, that goes through here at midnight. It's limited. Or may be they put too much powdered lime or something in the biscuits. What do you use, Julia? When did you say that the Beacon went to press?"

"Friday."

"And it's Tuesday now. Of course, you run some advertising that's already on the list? Come into the store in the morning and I'll get out our attraction. What's your policy about ads?"

"How do you mean?"

"Going to be frank with you. President Gray wrote me that was the proper way to deal with you. What I mean is this. Take another biscuit. They are awful small." Edwards took two at a time and made Douglas take another. "How about the ads Cleary's been running for two years? Here's a sample. I'll read it if it won't spoil our appetite."

He reached out his hand towards the paper rack near the table and took out an old copy of the paper.

"'Retonofel! The Greatest Discovery of the Age. Destroys the germs of disease. Absolute cure for dyspepsia, headache, rheumatism, gout, palpitation of the heart, eruptions of the skin, lassitude, dullness of sight, dizziness, numbness, and all disorders of the circulatory system. Ask your druggist for it, or send us one dollar for 12-oz. bottle; warranted to relieve; sent prepaid. Descriptive book free.'

"I'll warrant you it's warranted to relieve—relieve the sufferer of one dollar. Listen to this one.

"'Great discovery for suffering humanity. Sanitariums a thing of the past. Consumption cured. Our new and startling discovery indorsed by the International Congress on Consumption, at Berlin, will absolutely cure coughs, colds, consumption, bronchitis, asthma, hay fever, and kindred throat and lung troubles. Every bottle guaranteed to satisfy, or money refunded. Sold by all druggists, at 50 cts. and $1. Trial bottle free.'

"Here's another. They're as thick in the Beacon as liars in a political campaign.

"'Why suffer from rheumatism when Calderheim's Magic Balm will procure relief at once? Send us description of case and we will mail, free of charge, sample box of Balm. Six boxes, $5. Endorsed by the leading physicians. Do not be fooled by rival concoctions. Ours is genuine. Samples will be given free as long as supplies hold out.'

"Supply of what? Fools?" Mr. Edards blurted out, as he started to read nother, but Mrs. Edwards said mildly, Don't you think you have read enough, mes?"

"Yes, more than enough. One is a se. Do you know, Douglas, these pat- t medicine ads have made me sick for ars. After reading all these cures, ndwiched in between politics and local ws, and religious items in our country per, I have lost my faith in humanity, least that part of it that advertises the ull, and the other part that takes it at e dollar per bottle. Have you any set- ed policy about such ads?"

"I haven't given it much thought." ouglas spoke with a good deal of hesi- tion. But I see your point. The ads e misleading. They promise too much. hey—"

"In other words, they are the biggest nd of lies," said Edwards, with cheerful mphasis. "But all the county papers are ll of 'em, and I suppose they pay well."

"Cleary told me the paper couldn't be n without them."

"He did, eh?"

Mr. Edwards looked keenly at Douglas s if about to begin an argument, but hly said:

"Have a biscuit. No? Well, what's ft over will go into a bread pudding. ou can come in and help us eat that. y the way, Mayor Bartlett dropped in to e me and warn me against the new edi- r of the Beacon this afternoon. He had een to call on you and try to buy you ut, but I inferred he got sold himself." dwards chuckled, and began helping ouglas bountifully to some fruit.

"I don't know about that," Douglas miled. "But he did not buy me out."

"Tell us about it," Mrs. Edwards said, ith interest.

Douglas gave a rather graphic account his interview with the Mayor. Edwards as intensely interested. He chuckled any times, and once during the narrative e was so much absorbed, that in mechan- ally helping himself to some berries, he shed a large spoonful of them into his a. When Douglas had finished, he ex- aimed:

"The Mayor must have felt the need of l the patent medicines advertised by the eacon.' But do you realize what you ave done?"

"I suppose I have made an enemy of he Mayor."

"Not only that, you've got the machine own on you. You'll be the most hated an in Colby after Friday."

"Don't you think Mr. Douglas ought to ave begun a little more cautiously, ames?" Mrs. Edwards asked. She had lready began to feel a very warm interest n the young man and his plans.

"I doubt if the Mayor would appreciate aution. He's one of these men who don't eel anything very much unless it knocks im down. But I think, myself, that the eacon will be a stunner when it comes out this week. That one editorial alone ill make the old line politicians tell the ditor of the Beacon to stop their paper. 'our Monday morning mail will be interesting reading, Douglas. It will be fun to o through it."

"Do you think so?" Douglas asked, a ttle nervously.

"I know it. Why, if you carry out your olicy, it will stir up Colby deeper than a og show. There has never been any thing ke it here before. You have offended he Mayor. You have got the machine ned up against you. You are going to ght the saloon. You are going to tell he truth. What more could you do as a tarter to create a healthy sized crowd of eople in Anderson county who will be oming into the office of the Beacon next week to lick the editor? If I were you, I would engage the services of a husky young foreman to sit at the desk nearest the door and tell visitors that unexpected repairs on the press have called the editor away suddenly to Clinton. Or you might pacify the callers by giving each one of 'em a box of Calderheim's Magic Balm as a premium for renewal of subscription. The balm will disable them at less expense to you than the salary of the foreman."

"Don't you mind Mr. Edwards' talk," Mrs. Edwards smiled at Douglas. "There are some good people in Colby who will stand by you. Mr. Edwards is one of them. He's really delighted to have you here and to know that you are going to get out a clean, wholesome paper, aren't you, James?"

Mr. Edwards brought his fist down with an emphasis that made all the dishes rattle and his wife and Douglas start.

"Delighted! I'm with you Douglas, heart and soul. I have been so disgusted with the miserable, mean, contemptible paper we have had here for years, that it will seem as if the millennium had dawned for Colby when the new Beacon comes out Friday. And there's no use going slow or avoiding issues in order to win favor. I say, begin right. Tell the public in the first number just where you stand. Let the peanut politicians like Bartlett know without apologies just what to expect. And, as for the saloon, show it no more mercy than you would show a rattlesnake that was coiling up to strike its fangs into your baby. I'm not the only person in Colby to say this either. We're in a minority, it's true. But we're right, and there's an awful lot of power in being right. I don't say you'll have an easy time in getting out the paper. Like as not, you'll fail. The saloons have never been attacked before. Colby's always been for license. Only two ministers in this town ever came out flat-footed against the saloon, and they didn't stay very long. The pressure was too heavy from the business church members. That's where you'll have the hardest pull. Right where you have a right to expect the heartiest support, you'll get the least."

"Don't be too hard on the churches, James."

"I'm not too hard on them. They're hard on themselves. We've got fourteen churches here, and it's seven too many, and only two of them ever went on record against the saloon in public. There's Vernon, now, at the First Methodist. He's a new man. Preaches his first sermon next Sunday. They say he's all right. Fought the saloon to a finish in Leander last year. But may be the pressure here will be too strong for him. There are a dozen men in his church who will want him to keep still on account of it's being election year. If he comes out against the whiskey fellows, it will make things lively here this fall. I had thought of going away on a little vacation this summer. But since Douglas and Vernon have come, I think there will probably be a lot of fun here, that is, if Vernon is the man they say he is."

Douglas spent the evening in talking about the paper and asking questions concerning local conditions. Mrs. Edwards interfered occasionally by asking Douglas about his college life. He was looking over an album of photographs as he talked, and as he turned the pages he saw a familiar face.

"Why, that's Miss Harris!"

"Yes, do you know her?" Mrs. Edwards asked.

"Of course. We were classmates together for seven years."

"O, I forgot. I remember now. Esther's mother and I are very dear friends. I suppose you know Esther has a high school position here."

"She told me so."

"Fine girl. Don't you think? Going to room and board with us. When she comes. Julia," Mr. Edwards spoke up.

"I expect her the first week in September. The term opens the fourteenth. You see, Mr. Douglas, since our own children have grown up and married and moved away, we have been lonesome, and it will be a great pleasure to have Esther with us. You'll enjoy meeting her, won't you?"

"Yes, ma'am," Douglas answered. He turned over the pages of the album and the talk went on about something else, but when Mrs. Edwards was called into the other room for something the girl wanted and Mr. Edwards got up to open a window on account of the heat, Douglas turned back to the picture of his classmate and looked at it earnestly.

"Of course," Mr. Edwards said when he came back from the window, "you have made up your mind to be disappointed in a great many things. We can't always get everything we want."

"No, sir," replied Douglas, still looking at the photograph.

"But never mind. Don't get discouraged. You haven't any rivals. The field is clear for you. That's something."

Douglas blushed and started. "You mean, the Beacon?"

"Why, yes. What did you think I meant?"

"O, nothing, nothing. I—of course it is worth a good deal to have the field clear, but don't you think the Mayor and his friends may start up something?"

"It isn't at all likely. The time's too short between now and election. Don't worry over that. Make the paper interesting. Flatter the indifferent public a little. It likes flattery. Don't surrender a single principle, and roast the machine and the saloon to a finish, but let the public know you are in love with Colby and surroundings. Do the way you would do if you were courting some nice girl who was a little superior to you in intelligence and a good deal superior in good looks. See me? My wife is a seraph by the side of me, and I was as homely as the rough side of a match-box when I was a young man. But I won her by simply a combination of true flattery which took her attention off of my looks and directed it to her own and an independent attitude of standing up for unpopular causes that I knew were right. Any girl of spirit likes that sort of independence. You treat the public like that, and first thing it knows it will be attracted to the paper in spite of itself. Just as my wife was attracted——"

"How is that, James," his wife said, as she came back into the room and caught the last words of the sentence.

"I was just telling Douglas," said Edwards, winking at the young editor, "that you were attracted to me before we were married on account of my good looks. I've lost most of them since, but you haven't, Julia. You grow handsomer every day."

"That's a sample of his way, Mr Douglas," said Mrs. Edwards, laughing. "It was his flattery that won me more that his looks. But neither flattery nor looks are worth anything by the side of downright plain goodness. That's the real reason I was attracted to my husband."

"Talk of flattery, man," Edwards exclaimed, but the look he exchanged with his wife revealed a genuine courtship between the two that had continued through forty-five years of happy married life.

Douglas noted it swiftly and looked at the picture of Miss Harris again before he turned over the pages. The remainder of the evening was spent in general conversation and Douglas after ten o'clock when he went away.

"Let's go to Vernon next Sunday," Edwards said as Douglas was going out. "Our church is closed for repairs while the minister is away." The Edwards belonged to the Presbyterian denomination.

"All right, I'll be glad to go," replied Douglas. He said good night and went back to his dingy little room in the boarding house keeping with Mrs. Grundy, pictured Edwards and his wife sitting in the doorway in their home heartily visiting him to call often. When that person discovered there came on the screen a photograph that in spite of his attempt to remove it, stared there in mocking him with a pleasant pair of eyes.

"Mr. works cut out for me with the paper. I've no time for anything but hard work. There's no room for romance even if—he let the thought stop there, and next day resolutely went down to the little office and began to get out the papers.

The work was so absorbing that it soon compelled every faculty of his mind and every ounce of his physical strength. He was planning to get another helper as soon as possible, but had not been able to do it yet. He worked with tremendous energy. Took little time for meals or sleep. When the papers were all mailed out of the office Friday night he experienced a reaction. That night he slept late, and when he went down to the street about ten o'clock he was hardly prepared for the effect his first appearance as an editor was making on the people of Colby.

Late Friday evening he had hired some boys to take extra copies of the paper over town and distribute them at the stores and residences of non-subscribers. When he went down the street that Saturday morning he could not be ignorant of the fact that in a real sense the paper was creating a real sensation.

"I told you so," said Edwards, coming to the front of his store as Douglas looked in as he was going by. "There hasn't been so much excitement in Colby since the last dog show. The paper's all right. When those medicine ads time expires—well—I believe you'll be led to do the right thing. But the whole town's reading the Beacon this morning. You've stirred up the animals in great shape."

"I hope the paper will accomplish something," Douglas said modestly.

"Accomplish something! Why it's done that already. You'll hear from it by Monday. Shouldn't wonder if the post office should have to hire some extra clerks. Don't forget about church to-morrow. Come around to the house and we'll all go together."

Douglas promised, and went along down to his office. As he walked past the little hotel in the next block he was conscious that a group of men sitting out on the veranda, that was built close to the sidewalk, were discussing something quite vigorously, and as he went by one of them spoke his name to the rest, and the entire group gazed at him with staring interest. He held his head up and tried to appear indifferent but only partly succeeded. As he was turning into the office one of the saloon men, whose saloon was across the street from the Beacon, pointed him out to a customer who had stopped for a morning drink. Douglas could not hear what was said, but as he opened the door and went in he heard the two men laugh, and the sound affected him disagreeably, though he was soon busily engaged in the office and paid no attention to the locality. The laugh, however, conveyed to him a hint of the way in which the saloon men were taking his declaration of war.

SAMANTHA'S Independence Day

By Mary Lowe Dickinson

"FIFTEEN minutes before the train goes; plenty time to take a cup of tea!" and Miss Samantha Marble walked briskly into the railway restaurant of the Fitchburg depot in Boston, and took immediate possession of two chairs. She was a very little body, wrinkled and puckered about the mouth, and wrinkled and gray about the forehead; for she hated anything false, and carried her "views" to the point of despising artificial teeth and hair. On one chair she put her little self and on the other she piled her little bag, her little bundles, her little boxes and umbrella. Then she took off her gloves and her "far-away" glasses, and putting on her "near-by" spectacles took up the bill of fare.

She had had a hard day's work. Up in the early morning, riding into Fitchburg from Milltown on a neighbor's milk-wagon, in order to catch the first train; all day among the shops buying supplies for her little millinery store. She tucked in many a neighborly errand between times, such as matching Mrs. Brown's best black silk, and buying a frock for feeble Mrs. Hall's last baby—and a lot of what she called "Fourth o' july fixin's" for Widow Warner, whose boy was coming up from his clerkship in Boston to pass the holiday. Altogether, she had earned her cup of tea, and would have enjoyed it, but that her satisfaction was interrupted by the voices of two young men, who had the table before her. One sat with his back toward her, and his companion was saying:

"Now, Fred, what nonsense! It's Fourth of July, and the time when a fellow should be free, if he is ever going to be a man. And there you have stood over that desk without a holiday since Christmas! And now to go and spend the Fourth in that sleepy old town. I declare it's too bad."

"But I promised the folks at home, Tom, and they will be so disappointed. I confess I should like to take a run with you on to New York and see the sights, for I haven't been there since before my father died. He took me once, but I was such a little chap that I have forgotten everything about it."

"Oh, come along! We will take a night train, and have all day Sunday for Coney Island, and Monday, the Fourth, for fun."

"Can't do it, Tom; can't spend the money. Better come up in the country with me and we will see New York some other time."

"But you have got the money, Fred; and confound the old desk where we stand and drudge to earn it. There are easier ways to get it than that, boy, and if you would go with me I could show you a little game or two that would double your wages."

"If you mean gambling, Tom, none of that for me!"

"Well, I don't mean gambling. Every little game of chance doesn't deserve a hard name. Draughts and backgammon and cards, same things we played at home."

"Well, Tom, I'll have to go to the country. Better change your mind and come along."

"Not I; and go to church all Sunday;" but, suddenly, as they rose to go, he added, "Tell you what, Fred, you stay over and go to the theatre or have a game of billiards with me to-night and I'll go up with you on the Sunday train and spend the Fourth. Come now, that's fair."
